poem by UNCLE JOHN. You've made yer mind up, Jenny, so there's nothin' left to say, that I reckon would impress ye to do some other way. You never was a stubborn child, or one that don't behave, but you're mighty sot, I've noticed, on the little things you crave. So, you're goin' to the City—where there's heaps of fine "careers" and worlds of "opportunities" around ye everywhere—I wouldn't want to tie ye to yer mother's apron strings, for life, they say, is measured by the happiness it brings. When I think about them "type-machines" or clerkin' in a store, where the boss ain't never satisfied, but—allers wantin' more—where there's slim respects for pugity, and everything's fer show,—it overcomes me, Jenny, and—I hate—to see—ye—go! There's often hidden torments in the prospects that allure, and a million tons of riff-raff in the City's social sewers. And the hell of human passion, in the high as well as low,—I may be wrong about it, but,—I hate—to see—ye—go! Yer mother'll recollect ye, when she says the evenin' prayers. Some people think a mother is the only one that cares. But we'll watch the papers closer than we used to do, ye know—and we'll wonder—wonder—wonder, Child—I hate—to see—ye—go!

HOMIE PHILOSOPHY for 1922. AND it is written that the miners shall go back to work and that the miners shall strike again, and that the miners shall go to work again, and that they shall continue these backward and forward movements until they shall come to see the folly of it all and understand that that which has a beginning must have an end, and that the sooner man shall avoid the beginning, when the beginning spells disaster and trouble, the better for mankind, the miners included. And it is written that the capitalists shall peruse pretty much the same course of blind approach to the industrial problem; that they shall not seek a solution, but depend on temporary expedients until they recognize the great fundamental, that God will not allow the crushing of humanity, but has destined that man shall improve, themselves included.
