THE CHIEF HOWLER OF GALLI-POLI.

It is, I take it, its sanctity that makes Gallipoli so unprogressive as compared with neighboring towns, such as Dardanelles and Rodosto. In dress, manners and mode of life it has not perceptibly altered in the last century. Except the foreign Consuls, who, of course, are clad in western fashion, eastern dress of the oldest type is worn by both Greek and Turk, and the quilted doublet and furred pelrine have not given way to the "Stambouli," which both Kayah and Osmanli have generally adopted elsewhere.

Rich in shrines and monastic institutions, Gallipoli has been from the early days of Ottoman rule in Europe a stronghold of faith. It shelters three sects of Dervishes—the Beys, the largest landed proprietors, are mostly affiliated to one or other of the orders; wealth and influence belong here to Islam, and the high priest of Howlers overrides that of the appointed Governor. An able, enterprising, intriguing, money-getting fellow is this distinguished Dervish, though you would hardly think it to see him with bowing head and eyes cast down, pale and ascetic of aspect, in green pejshe and turbaned cap, slowly pacing the streets on his high-bred horse, with an attendant holding either stirrup. Still less would you think if you saw him in the Mosque on Tuesday or Friday, howling like a maniac till he foams at the mouth and drops excrement.

And yet this Hussam Effendi is a keen man of business, managing vast estates with great ability, and conducts extensive commercial operations in timber and agricultural produce with success, lands money to small farmers, has a large share in a steam flour mill and biscuit factory, and is one of the largest contractors for army and navy supplies. It is impossible to believe that one of such practical mind as Hussam Effendi should have faith in the value, theological speaking, of his grotesque and painful ritual; but he owes much of his reputation for hotness, which, won by constant and efficient howling, is as substantial an item of his large stock-in-trade as the engine in his biscuit factory. Hussam Effendi's steadfastness to the rule of his order is thus by no means irreconcilable with his keen pursuit of this world's goods. Howling pays in one fashion, biscuit-making in another; while by the judicious blending of mysticism with commerce the operator comes to occupy a sort of neutral ground on which he can serve indifferently both God and Mammon.—[London Times Gallipoli Correspondence.]

General James Shields, who has been the subject of so much turmoil in Congress, was born in Tyrone, Ireland, 1810; came to this country in 1826; settled in Illinois; studied law; was a legislator and judge; was made by Polk Commissioner of the General Land Office; was made Brigadier General for the Mexican war; was shot through the lungs, but recovered; fought at Chepultepec bare headed and in his shirt sleeves, without a horse, was again wounded; rescued from outrage a lady and her daughter in the night time by a secret and disobedient ally; became Senator from Illinois; was afterward beaten by Lyman Trumbull; went to Minnesota; was, as a farmer, elected therefrom to the Senate of the United States as a Democrat; became a Brigadier General in the Union army; succeeded Lander; drove out Stonewall Jackson while Fremont was pursuing Jackson through the Shoshone, both Federal Generals being victims of a war department; was nominated for Major General, but was not confirmed, and removed to a farm in Missouri, where he has since lived on a pension raised from $31 to $50 a month. He is five feet eight inches tall; has a swarthy face and dark hair; speaks fluently, and is a little visionary, enthusiastic and adventurous.

It is now a well settled fact that the desert between the Colorado river and the California coast range mountains is not so much of a desert after all though some portions seems to be worthless. This desolate looking country in certain places is producing fine crops of grain, alfalfa, vegetables and fruit. The manufacture of paper stock from the yucca is an established industry and employs many men. Vast beds of borax, gypsum, potters' clay, sulphur, soda, and rock are found in localities easily reached. Silver, lead, copper, gold, and asbestos with long fibre, are found in considerable quantities, and quartz mill and smelting works are doing well. The Central Pacific is working the salt mines and establishing quite a trade in that article. It is believed that the "desert" will yet be considered one of the most valuable portions of the State.—[Sac Bee.]

OREGON VOLCANOES.

A recent letter from Salem, Oregon, to the Sacramento Record-Union says: "I have been interested lately in talking with J. L. Parrish, one of the earliest Methodist missionaries, who came to Oregon in 1839, when all things were aboriginal and untamed wilderness blossomed with the wildest possible growth of roses.

He describes an eruption of Mount St. Helens that occurred in the latter part of November 1842, which was for a short while a very grand spectacle, and continued, with lessened force, for a long time. There was no fire visible, but a dense smoke poured out of the side of the mountain, sinking like a black pall on all the landscape, while viewed from a distance of at least 100 miles, as it was from Salem, the observer saw pillars and billows of steam rising above the crater, presenting a strong contrast to the blackness that hung below, and forming a spectacle of unsurpassed magnificence. It was a great wonder while it lasted, and distance lent an enchantment that was not well appreciated by those who dwelt near by, of whom there were not many at that early day. A great area that was reached by the sweep of the November winds was whitened with falling ashes that looked very ominous, but did no certain harm.

Occasionally one or other of our mountain tops indulges in a quiet smoke, but not on such an extensive scale as did St. Helens thirty-five years ago. I have seen Mount Hood pour out blackness on a clear winter sky, and those who climb the old hill speak of a crater on the southwest, a mile below the summit, where the hot sulphurous air rises between the loose rocks that are kept piping hot.

Mount Baker goes in a fume occasionally, but that is too far off to have much interest for us."

The Colorado river is noted for "swirls," so called. They occur everywhere, but only at high stages of water. A bubble rises from the bottom and breaks with a slight sound on the surface. The water at that point begins a rotary motion, so small that an inverted tea-cup might cover it. Larger and larger grows the circle, till a surface of forty feet in diameter is in motion, spinning round a funnel-shaped hole in the center, two or three feet across the top, and coming to a point in the depths below. Often a large tree floating down the stream is caught and its fore-most end thrust up into the air twenty or thirty feet, while the other passes underneath—the exposed end to be slowly drawn down again, and to disappear. Three soldiers, deserters from Camp Mohave, passing through the ravine in a skiff, immediately below the fork, suffered their craft to run into a swirl. One of the crew, at the first intimation of danger, threw himself overboard beyond the charmed circle, and as he swam away he turned his head and saw the boat spin round until one end being drawn into the vortex and the other upheaved into the air, it slowly sank as it revolved into the turbid bosom of the river, its human freight to be seen no more, for the Colorado river does not give up the dead—no corpses lodge upon its shores.

A Vermont newspaper is responsible for the following story: "A circumstance which savors more of spiritualism than anything the Eddys ever did, is vouched for in South Woodstock. About three years ago F. B. Fletcher moved to the place from Mystic, Conn., and several evenings after, when his friends gave him a house-warming a small eight-day clock, which stood on the parlor mantel, unbound and without a pendulum, struck a number of times, and continued running for a couple of days. After a silence of two years, and while in its previous condition, the clock showed life again during another party. This performance has been repeated at a third party with in a few days, and the clock ran exactly twenty-four hours, every effort to stop it proving as useless as the attempts to make it run since then."

Deacon Bill Gibson, one of Gold Hill's most devout citizens, has a new invention which will supersede turas and cremations. He discovered a remarkably volatile gas, which has great buoyancy. His idea is to get up a kind of balloon that will be strong enough to sustain the weight of a human body. When he dies his remains will be placed in one of these machines and turned loose. Of course it will shoot upward into the upper atmosphere, where everything is so cold that decomposition will never take place. The balloon will be above the belts of moisture, and the action of the elements will be entirely suspended, so that the balloon will last forever. Thus will the good man accomplish his heart's wish in getting near to heaven and at the same time open to the minds of the people a new and beautiful thought with regard to the disposition of their beloved dead.—[G. H. News.]

A PUZZLED PLANT—Plants sleep at night as is well known, but their sleeping hours are a matter of habit, and can easily be disturbed. A French chemist recently exposed a sensitive-plant to a bright light at night, and placed it in a dark room during the day. The plant at first appeared much puzzled. It opened and closed its leaves irregularly, in spite of the artificial sun beaming upon it at night and in the day time it sometimes awoke. It finally submitted to the change, unfolding itself regularly at night and closing in the morning.

Chief Joseph was found in his tent enjoying a cigar, in company with his wife, child and the warrior "Charley," who was first captured and sent here some months before Joseph's defeat by General Miles. "Charley" having only been recently released from the guard-house and permitted to take up his quarters with his chief who had honored him with a trustworthy position during the campaign. The chief appeared as tranquil as on the day of his arrival, and was dressed about in the same manner. He stated through Charley, who acted as interpreter, that he was not unhappy, and that his people were being treated as well as could be expected. In front of his neatly arranged tent stands a large tree, which he has blazed, and on the white wood painted a number of hieroglyphics, which detail the cause of his residence on the banks of the Missouri. The base of the "blaze" is filled with a long row of Indian lodges painted in real. Above these are horses, birds, wolves, dogs, and men, all represented in such a manner as to convey the idea that they are all closely connected. One peculiar feature is that of the outline of the birds, if closely observed, very much resemble the birds carved on Cleopatra's needle, which has been recently landed in London, and the position, too, is the same being at the top of all other characters. Whatever it is, it is of deep significance to the Indians, who all seem to be able to read it and understand its report. The work was executed by Chief Joseph himself, and we must say that his talents as an artist of this kind are not of the worst. [Leavenworth Times.]

Ben Garvin, an engineer on the Fond du Lac narrow-gauge, is one of the oldest railway engineers in the country. He ran the first train into Montpelier, Vt. in 1843. In 1859 he hauled the first train out of Oshkosh into Chicago. He boarded his first engine nearly thirty-five years ago in the Green Mountain State, and in this continuous service has never killed a man, woman or child.
