THE NATIONAL FLOWER.

Bob Burdette Casts His Vote in Favor of the Humble Plantain.

I am going to record my vote for the National flower, and I am not going to pay Messrs. Whang & Co. twenty-five cents for the privilege either. Talk about corruption in our National elections, there has been more money spent in this flower campaign, right at the polls, and openly, too, than would elect a councilman. Fellow citizens, Indians not taxed, Chinamen and women, I give my hand and my vote to the humble and obtrusive plantain. She needs no encomium from me. There she stands, or rather squats. Where? Right there, right where you are looking at this minute if there is a spot of ground six inches square within half a mile of you. In the velvet lawn that costs you four dollars a square foot; in the pansy bed; in the tub wherein grows the accursed oleander, breaker of human backs; in the garden of roses; in the toothsome bed where the south wind loiters amid the loud breathed onion, stealing and giving odor; wherever you have planted anything; wherever you haven't; on the hillsides of New England, on the bleak and rocky coast of Maine, in the orange groves of Florida, on the great alkali deserts of the wild and woolly West, where Shasta's hoary head lifts itself to the clouds, crowned with eternal grandeur, and where the gibbering tourist cackles and chatters through the glories of Mount Washington; wherever the foot of man has trod, and everywhere that it hasn't, there springs this radiant weed of hope, eternal on the mundane breast; there strikes its ell long root, this herb of truth, though ofttimes crushed to earth, rising again stronger than ever, and spreading itself over the adjacent grass, like a true born American hogging four seats in a railway car. Oh, citizens, I do bespeak your "most sweet voices" for the plantain. It knows no East, no South, no North, no West; it has no sectional prejudices, no local pride or limitation; just wherever the soil is fertile or barren it lays hold on life; it comes to stay, it gets there, Eli. Where nothing else will grow it flourishes like the grass-hopper; where smartweed perishes because it has no root the plantain makes a crop. A few short weeks in slushy spring the Mayflower hides its pretty bloom in mountain slopes and eastern hills, a transient guest of local fame and briefest life. When autumn flings her gorgeous banners to the skies, the golden-rod, for a few passing weeks, makes radiant the meadow, glen and hill, and then departs to hide away the year; but thou, oh! plantain of the sandy crew, thou hast the grip; thou art a stayer, thou; thou art a laster from Wayback; thou art the first to come, the last to go. Thee, the all beholding sun upon his annual farrow! thou sees all the time, making glad the 3000 yard of the poor, and playing merry Cain upon the rich man's lawn. Thou thrive upon persecution; thou turnest not back from them for the grasshopper, and sayest among the lawn mower, ha, ha! The rains nourish thee; the sun-burned drought maketh thee strong; a black frost tinge thy leaves with luster, life and a six foot freeze that kills thy cast-iron hitching posts is pie for thy plantain. It is American, etc., etc., through, this fresh and cheery weed. It has an imported name—plantainacea, and is proud of it, as any American when she has invented a coat of arms and married an ancestor. That is its family name; the plantain which claims the honor of being the national flower has a name as purely American as the continent itself—Plantago major. Long live the major! Forever float that standard weed, where—Eh? What's that? "It isn't an American plant at all; it is found all over the inhabited and uninhabited world." Well, Joemeses River! Isn't that American? Rise up, major, you are elected.—Robert J. Burdette, in Brooklyn Eagle.
