

Encampment of Peace on Bloody Battlefield
And a Typical Group at the Gettysburg Reunion

The above photographs were taken at Gettysburg, Pa., where more than 50,000 veterans of the Civil war celebrated the semi-centennial of the battle of Gettysburg. Six thousand tents, erected by the regular United States army on the site of the bloody battle, barely accommodated the legion of Union and Confederate warriors who had assembled to peacefully recall historical incidents of the great struggle. The veterans in the upper photograph are: Left to right—Abraham Arnst of the 17th Pennsylvania infantry; W. H. Arhart of the 12th Virginia, and B. F. Angle of the 15th Pennsylvania.

JANE ADDAMS IS NOT A CANDIDATE

Says It Would be Unwise For Women to Rush Into Office as Soon as They Were Given the Right to Vote.

NEW YORK, July 5.—Miss Jane Addams, who has arrived from Europe, where she attended the International Woman Suffrage convention in Budapest, declared she did not wish to be a candidate for mayor of Chicago in the coming election. But she qualified her refusal to answer the call that has been started by her friends since women were given the vote in Illinois.

As the Olympic came up the river Miss Addams explained why she believed it would be unwise for her to accept a nomination even if it is thrust on her.

"The fact that some of my friends have mentioned me as a likely candidate for mayor of Chicago," said Miss Addams, "is a great surprise to me and it is hardly fair to expect me to answer at this time a flat question as to whether I would accept a nomination.

Unwise to be Candidate. "It is against our principles to rush in for officeholding the moment we have received the vote. It would be very unwise for the women of Illinois to accept or seek public office until they have had a few years' experience as voters. At this time I think I should refuse to be a candidate for any public office.

"It is a hypothetical question, but I repeat that even if, as the question suggests, I should be called and nominated against my wishes I should refuse any nomination."

Surprised at Action. Miss Addams expressed herself as having been slightly surprised that Illinois had given women the vote and right to hold office. She declared it was a great victory for the cause and said the chief influence lay in the fact that a state as large as Illinois east of the Mississippi had decided in favor of equal suffrage. She had believed, she said, that Wisconsin would give women the vote before Illinois. Asked if the women of her state would vote as women voters or would align themselves with various political parties, Miss Addams said:

"We will not, as women voters, remain segregated and vote merely as a woman's party except on some moral or sociological questions that only the influence of women's votes will settle correctly."

DRAPERY GIVES WAY TO TUNICS

Tunics Are Best Suited For Summer Wear According to Paris Information—Colors Are as Riotous as Ever.

There have been rumors from Paris of the effect that drapery seems to be passing away and that the tunic, that has been an integral part of fashion for some time has returned again with renewed popularity. This is undoubtedly based on the fact that for summer fabrics, which must be washed, drapery is not particularly appropriate and to relieve the plainness of the skirts the dressmakers have been forced to depend on the overskirt, a logical and reasonable solution of the problem. But it is very unlikely that drapery as used in winter things will suffer by a momentary and necessary eclipse, for it is entirely new in its present form to the existing general, and there are many novelties in treatment that will probably be tried before it is replaced by something newer or a revival of something older. These are suppositions based upon past experience with the whims of fashion and always admitting that a sudden inspiration of a sartorial genius may win instant and universal favor, thus changing the whole trend of fashion's bark. Such things have been known to occur quite frequently, but dressmakers as a class are glad of the opportunity to handle fabrics in any way the fancy dictates and they will be slow to advocate anything stereotyped.

There is one great criticism of the present styles, and that is that all the gowns are made exactly alike as far as the bodice is concerned. Generally speaking, every gown has a surplice kind of bodice and a crossed net vest affair in front with a shallow or medici collar. This has grown extremely monotonous, both to those who make them and those who wear them, although the style is one that is quite universally becoming. The chances are that in the fall, when the designers return from their summer holidays, they will try to find some bodice fashion more flexible in trimming and never in line which will at the same time accord very well with the drapery of the skirt, and such a combination seems to be at hand in a variation of the pointed and boned bodice with the necessarily smaller waist and a suspension of hips. This is merely guess work, though; only the fall opening will reveal the prevailing modes for the next year.

In the meantime the sash and girde hold full sway and colors are as riotous as ever. Sleeves are not always long, as they were in the cooler days of spring, though many of the smart gowns are all finished with sleeves to the wrists with elongated shoulder or tremendous armholes, which give the same effect. Another style, too, that has increased in use during even the last few weeks, is the gown with the Russian blouse with plaited tails.
