HOW TO CAN CORN ON THE COB.

BY CAROLINE COE.

Last winter I was invited to a friend's house and, much to my surprise, at dinner, there was brought on steaming hot corn on the cob.

It was delicious. I immediately asked how it was prepared, and my friend, who is one of the best of cooks, said:

"I canned it after a recipe of my own," and added, "I would not advise much corn to be put up in this way, for the work is long and great care must be taken."

"In the first place, you must have the wide top, half-gallon cans. In these you put as many short ears of corn as they will comfortably hold."

"Be sure that the corn is freshly picked and that there are no decaying kernels on the cob. Have some hot water, to which has been added granulated sugar in the proportion of a heaping teaspoonful to one quart of water."

"Put your cans in a boiler on some hay or cloth to keep them from the metal bottom. Fill the cans with the hot sugar water and put on covers lightly. Fill the boiler with water to about two-thirds up the can. Boil four hours. Let cool and screw on can tops carefully and stand bottom side up for three days."

"I had splendid luck with this recipe, and my corn on the cob at Christmas was hailed with delight," said my friend. "I have already put up a couple of dozen cans."

Miss Jessie Ackerman Says They Have Advanced in Every Country.

NEW YORK, Aug. 27.—After an eight years' absence from these, her native shores, on her eighth trip around the world, Miss Jessie Ackerman, writer and lecturer, has just returned to America...

"Women have advanced all along the lines of cultural and social development far more rapidly than the most sanguine of us could have anticipated a few years ago," she said at the City club.

"I have been through Turkey and Syria, I have been in the Russias and in the far east, and have found no community where the evidences of woman's advance were not to be found at every hand."

"Change Greatest in China. It all came swiftly and impressed me all the more profoundly, because when I was in China twenty years ago I saw and studied things there as they used to be."

"Now the women are to enter the liberty of the new republic on the same footing as the men. That has been guaranteed to them. You know, they had their militants there, who were very active in the south. They stormed the houses and threw stones and kicked the legislators about a bit and made themselves generally annoying."

"The freest country on earth. I was more interested in Australia than in any other country I visited, with the possible exception of Argentina. Australia is the freest country on earth. They have the suffrage there now. The critics from afar have told how, in some of the states, the women took little interest in the ballot and its possibilities."

"I asked one of the men what they did about it. 'Oh,' he said, 'we moved the assembly to the north.'"

"They had not asked for the vote, which came to them as it did to the rest of Australia, as a party measure, a political expedient. The suffrage is appreciated and used only where it was come to women as a result of their own work—where, in other words, receiving of the vote has been preceded by a period of education such as is going on in Holland now, for instance."

"The women of Australia are the finest mothers in the world. That is because they have been unable to get domestic help and have been obliged to run their own homes. They are pioneer women, the Austrians are working alongside their husbands in the felling and burning of trees in the bush. There are women farmers there, and in Victoria women solicitors."

Three heaping tablespoons grated bitter chocolate. Four slightly rounded tablespoons sifted flour. Three-fourths cup milk. One-third cup butter.
