SOME CHARMING IDEAS IN FALL HATS

One of the new fall black velvet hats which Virot is featuring is rather larger than we have been wearing this summer. It also rolls away from the face more. This will have the tendency to make one look older.

Black and white will be much worn, and the Virot hat is trimmed with white ostrich feathers about the rim and a bunch of ostrich quills with the fluffy feathers left at the tips.

Girls will wear gray much this winter. A young girl's hat of dark gray velvet is made in Tam O'Shanted fashion, with a roll of white satin on the edge of the rim and a flat white bow at the top. With this is worn gray and white squirrel skins dyed to simulate chinchilla.

are today, and the fear is expressed that their popularity will tend to cheapen them. One either likes or dislikes plaid materials; there are no half measures, and the woman who everuses plaids is almost sure to kill them for the woman in search of exclusive styles. There are some very artistic plaid materials shown, many reproductions of the well known Scotch tartans, and a larger number of new designs in soft greens and blues, with stripes of silver or gold and unusual brown and purple combinations. Plaids are being made both in silk and in cloths.

TAILORED SUITS GREATLY VARIED

Dark Colors Will Prevail in the Street Costumes Seen This Fall—There Are Modes For Every Woman in Shops.

Shopping for the autumn tailored suit will be far more interesting than for the spring tailormade, because variety is the keynote of the coming styles. There was a wearisome monotony last season in both skirts and coats, little variation in length, practically none in trimming, and very little in cut and material.

This year there are models for all manner of women; there are short, jaunty coats for tall, slender figures, long, three-quarter length garments for more matronly figures; draped skirts and plain ones; belts and waistcoats or wide sashes and vests. She would be indeed a curious creature who could not find a suit to please her this autumn.

On one point the majority of French couturiers agree, and that is a dark, subdued coloring for street costumes. The bright, vivid tones are all very well for the summer, when every one is frivolous, more or less, and nature is in a riotous mood, but for the winter the reaction from those violent colorings is very pleasing.

lack, however, has a serious rival in "tete de negre," which is almost indistinguishable from black, but which on close inspection betrays a brownish shading. Another equally popular color is midnight blue, a very deep navy blue that suggests black. There is also a deep rich purple and a georgette green which is darker than the famous basket green.

Brilliant Colored Trimmings.
This leaning toward black colors for the street does not mean that all color will be kept for indoor functions and for the evenings, but that the brilliant tones will be centered in the trimmings.

Vests and waistcoats may reflect one or many of the radiant hues, some of the art nouveau stuffs displaying a remarkable blending of color. Against the dark background of the suit those accessories borrowed from the masculine contingent stand out with a vividness which is startling.

Waistcoats are of many types; some are mere vests, which fill in the open space in front made by slanting the coat directly back from the fastening over the bust; others are fashioned like men's waistcoats, with backs of plain satin. Many coats are made to be worn with or without the waistcoats, on the other hand, is worn frequently without the coat. The plain taffetas and satins are used generally for the waistcoats worn with blouses. Still another type of waistcoat could be described as a girld vest.

When the jacket is removed the effect is very similar to that produced by any high girdle.

Subdued Colors in Plaids.
The color note is sounded in plaids, which are combined freely with plain materials, but this color note, it must be admitted, is very much subdued. It has been many seasons since plaid goods have been as popular as they Improvement.

Glasses not only preserve the eyes but in many cases develop and improve them. Eyes that are defective never attain a full development until glasses are worn. They are upon a constant strain which weakens the tissues. The vision is imperfect and of course cannot become acute without aid. With glasses the strain is relieved and the eyes put in exact focus. Every object is clear and distinct. The nerves become keener and sharper. The muscles become stronger and the entire eye takes on a normal tone. If your eyes give trouble do not postpone the matter. The longer you put off wearing glasses the worse they will become. The sooner you begin the longer they will last and the stronger they will be. I do not charge for consultation.
