

Widow of Hero Scott and Her Son to Live in King's Palace

LADY SCOTT AND HER YOUNG SON, PETER.

LONDON, Dec. 1.—That Lady Scott and her son, Peter, widow and child of the late Sir Robert Falcon Scott, the brave English explorer, who perished with his party after they had made a heroic dash across the Antarctic ice fields to the south pole, will not be obliged to depend upon private charity for sustenance is due to the action of King George.

Grippe Gives the Doctor Plenty of Good Practice

BY H. SIBLEY.

"Doctor, something's the matter with me."

"The doctor didn't seem to be startled by that announcement. He calmly laid down the bulky volume he had been reading and peered at me through gold rimmed spectacles.

"H'm," he said (that is the professional way to begin a diagnosis nowadays). The old fashioned practitioner used to ask you to stick out your tongue. Many dark secrets lurk in the coating of a tongue.

"That's just what I came to find out," I replied. "I don't feel right—have increasing appetite and loss of desire for work. Those two things don't seem to work out together very well."

"Well," he ventured, "you might have anything from spring fever to typhoid. I must have something more definite. Haven't you other symptoms?"

"Yes, about a dozen. I ache here and here and here and here—in fact, I ache all over the place."

"Ah, I see—you have the grippe." I thought I was losing my grip, but just the same, I was relieved. Grippe couldn't be so very serious. I asked the doctor if it was.

"No-o-o," he hesitated in a way that was not reassuring. "No, but it's uncomfortable. Step in here."

Was it Chloroform? He opened the door to his work shop and a heavy odor of chloroform—or possibly it was coal gas—hung in the air. That sounds like a para-dox—something heavy hanging in the air. At any rate, we stepped into the room which was furnished with a barber's chair and a lot of instruments that looked like they might feel at home in a meat market.

"The doctor closed the door (I think he locked it, too) and turning to me, ordered, 'sit down in that chair.' His tone was peremptory. My symptoms began to disappear. I told the doctor so.

"He ignored that announcement. 'Sit right down there and I'll have you fixed up in a hurry.' Turning to a cabinet he removed therefrom a slender glass tube and making a jab at my mouth, said, 'open up!'"

"That doctor," I remonstrated, "I can't swallow that!"

"Don't have to; that's a thermometer."

"Oh," I said, "I thought it was a capsule." The doctor grunted to me. After taking some of my temperature from beneath my tongue, which seemed the wrong place to take it, because I was pretty hot under the collar just then, the doctor closely scrutinized my general interior arrangement as well as he could through my mouth, and muttered something with a wild west sound like "broncho-pneumonia."

"Perhaps I should have gone to a veterinary, but I didn't suggest it."

"Looks like there was a touch of laryngeal inflammation," he continued, prying my mouth open as far as he could without breaking the hinges and propping it in place with a clothes pin, as he peered into the depths. "Gessir, the tracheal and laryngeal membranes are affected, and your case is getting interesting."

Yes, fascinating. I gurgled and slipped farther down in the chair. Indeed it was getting interesting—absolutely fascinating, I should say.

"I perceive signs of gastro-intestinal pleurisy—had any chills lately?"

I immediately had a chill to accommodate him.

"Well, well, we must look into this further," he resumed, though it seemed to me he had looked as far as he could. In fact I was on the point of asking him to see what made my foot tickle while he was inspecting the depths, but I couldn't, because I had an impediment in my speech in the shape of a clothespin.

Next he began to prod me in that region just below the diaphragm—that region which Nature has protected in the mud-turtle and the armadillo, but which she has left exposed in the human being who needs it the most. I thought the doctor had lost something—perhaps his fountain pen or one of his cuffs. He didn't find anything, however, and after I had become so weakened by this treatment that I couldn't bite, he removed the gag from my mouth, and with some effort I managed to close it and shut out the draft.

Then he began to prescribe. Said he: "Your case has gone rather too far. We will have to take heroic measures."

"More of them?" I asked feebly.

He didn't seem to hear me, and continued: "I'll have to administer phenacetin, acetanilid, caffeine and bromides to relieve the nervous tension."

I handed him my watch on account. He gives it up.

He continued outlining more symptoms and prescribing for them, but I stopped him. "Doc," I said, "it ain't any use. This has gone far enough. I don't stand a chance on a thousand to recover, and I can't afford to take that chance. Of course I might mortgage the piano—or even the house, but as long as I am bound to go anyway, I want to leave something for posterity."

STOMACH SUFFERERS

MAYR'S Wonderful Stomach Remedy is Recommended and Praised by Thousands Who Have Been Restored.

"I was a sick man for about three months—a case of Liver and Stomach trouble. I was told by three of our most prominent physicians that I would have to submit to an operation to get relief, but when I heard of your Wonderful Stomach Remedy and secured a bottle, I tried it and took it according to directions and passed on to health. Since taking your medicine I work regularly and don't feel any ill effects. I am praising your Remedy to all my friends as it is worthy of the highest praise. B. L. DOOLEY, Roanoke, Va.

TWICE AS MANY WANT JOBS IN NOV. AS IN OCTOBER.

The number of applications for positions at the public employment office during the past month has doubled over those of October. A report made Tuesday showed that during November 557 were made and that 174 were filled. There were 297 applications for help made to the bureau by employers. Of job seekers the larger percent were men, they making over 500 applications. Out of the 37 applications for female help only 16 places were filled.

Although these figures show a large increase over the past month, they are about normal for this time of the year. During December the demand for positions will probably be about as heavy until the first of the year.

He believed that the scientists of the nineteenth century committed a great mistake in adopting vaccination. The present-day theory of immunity on which most of the progress of medicine is based had not developed at that time, and doubtless the logical mind of Wallace rejected vaccination because it seemed to him unscientific.

Another great mistake of science, according to his belief, was the rejection of the scientific world of the whole theory of phrenology. Wallace believed that there was in phrenology something which should have been taken hold of and studied. The importance placed upon head formation by the Lombroso school is interesting as showing that Wallace might have been right in this. Not that the phrenologists are altogether or even to any great extent right; but that science in condemning phrenology in toto was wrong.

But the thing which made the greatest breach between Wallace and his scientific brethren was the refusal of science to do so much as investigate adequately the phenomena of spiritualism. Wallace was possessed of a strictly scientific mind, and he thought he saw in the spiritistic phenomena a great body of fact which science should study, collate and, if possible, develop into a science.

The announcement by the daughter of William T. Stead that she is about to publish a book on the subject of the spirit communications which she claims to have had with her illustrious father since he was lost with the Titanic emphasizes the fact that spiritistic phenomena are coming to be recognized by a greater and greater body of scientific minds as well worth study. Such names as Wallace, Lodge, James, Hodgson, Hyslop, and found in the roster of those who are not afraid to break with the great body of scientists on this matter.

Science has introduced into the world a new kind of honesty. The fact Darwin was willing to give to Wallace the credit for the discovery of the law of evolution is one fine proof of this.

Omega Oil FOR Neuralgia

Soak a piece of flannel with Omega Oil, lay it over the aching nerves, cover with a piece of oiled silk and press tightly against the face with the hand. This treatment has brought nights of peaceful rest to people who have suffered agonies and is certainly worth trying. Trial bottle 10c.

SCIENCE IS WRONG IN IT'S HARD-FACED REJECTION OF PLAIN FACTS RELATING TO PSYCHIC PHENOMENA

BY HERBERT QUICK. (Copyright, 1913, by the Newspaper Enterprise Association.) Alfred Russell Wallace, who has just passed away full of years and honors, was one of the greatest scientists of his time. For a long time before his death, however, he was in scientific disrepute. He was regarded as among those who went off chasing rainbows. He was opposed to vaccination, and wrote a book attacking it. Vaccination survived his attack, and recent discoveries added to decades of experience seem to indicate the Wallace was in error.
