WOMAN WRITER SAYS "ANYONE CAN GET A DIVORCE BUT IT TAKES INTELLIGENCE TO STAY MARRIED"

ANNE CRAWFORD FLEXNER AND HER LITTLE DAUGHTER.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Newspaper Enterprise Association.)

"You can't win any game except by playing it to win. Yet many women, when they marry, behave as though they had won the game, instead of just begun it."

With these lines as a text, Anne Crawford Flexner, who admits that she has played to win—she is happily married and the mother of two children—has sprung into sudden fame as the author of "The Marriage Game," a sprightly comedy of modern marriage which has scored the greatest dramatic success of the week in New York.

"This play presents the novel situation of a siren, who, after winning the attention of a group of semi-detached husbands, holds the mirror up to their wives that the astonished ladies may perceive that a wife's worst enemy is not the dreaded Other Woman, but purely and simply—HERSELF."

"Marriage is a game—the most difficult yet the most fascinating game in the world," Mrs. Flexner explained to me yesterday. "I have observed it in Europe and in the United States—Mr. Flexner has been abroad a great deal in connection with his work for Mr. Rockefeller's General Education Board—and it seems to me the German and English women play their cards better, even thought fate deals the American woman a better hand."

"I think the American girl accepts marriage as an end instead of a beginning. Once she has passed the altar, she is too apt to feel anchored or becalmed when, in reality, she is just leaving the harbor upon an unknown and dangerous voyage! It is my belief that a man's interest in a woman ceases the moment he has realized there is nothing more to know about her."

"The thing that allures in man, woman or child is the undiscovered country—the Beyond. Many American women don't seem to have any beyond and are unable to create the illusion of it."

"This is a great pity, for the new generation of men demands a great deal from the women they seek as wives."

"They want intelligence, co-operation, comradeship. Very soon the doll-woman will discover that there is nobody willing to provide a doll's house for her."

"If marriage is a game, how shall women play it to win?" I asked. "Perhaps there are rules."

"There are three rules," Mrs. Flexner answered with smiling readiness. "The first is: Build no barriers between your husband and yourself. It is hard enough for any two human beings to understand each other when love and sympathy have let down all bars. The throwing up of artificial barricades—quarrels, sulks, silly affectations, is fatal to happiness."

"The second rule is: Let your husband lead—sometimes. He is entitled to his turn!"

"The third is: Pursue no passionate pursuit—your husband may pursue another! Or at any rate she may pursue him! This applies to the bridge fiend, the society fiend, the woman who rides any of the hundred hobbies of modern life into the ground."

"After all, man plays the marriage game fairly—he supports the woman and her children. He is entitled to some return."

"I find that if the American woman doesn't like her hand she is too inclined to throw down her cards and say she won't play. Don't you agree with me?"

"As to my own view of the marriage game," I replied, "I am convinced that you finish at about the place you start. In other words, that in progressive matrimony you don't really progress; that first loves are best mainly because last loves turn out invariably to be no better! After all, any fool can get a divorce, but it takes intelligence to stay married!"

"Why doesn't someone say that to our young men and women?" Mrs. Flexner exclaimed. "Why don't we break through the conspiracy of silence that the world maintains against them?"

"Perhaps because we want them to get married!" I suggested, "but, after all, are there no rules for men in the marriage game?"

"There are," Mrs. Flexner replied smilingly, "but those rules are another play!"
