Revelations of A Wife

THE PLAN THAT KATHERINE'S WORK MADE POSSIBLE
The tenderness, the near-agonizing which was in Lillian's manner as she took Katherine's hastily-scribbled notes in her hands told us of the importance she attached to these fragments of apparent nonsense which our little friend had jotted down from the conversation of Anton and Joe.

She walked swiftly to the window with them, drew a chair to the light and began to examine them closely, patiently forgetting time, our presence, everything, in the curious fascination the notes had for her. Katherine and I sat stony watching her, feeling a rising tide of excitement in our own veins, so plainly did we see the vital importance which Lillian attached to the scribbled words and figures.

Through the open window the occasional whir of a motor car, the clatter of a farm team, the voices of school children punctured the peace of the sleepy village. As far as outward seeming went, we were leagues away from agitations, sorrows, crime, and yet I knew, without understanding what it was all about, that Lillian held in her hands the symbols of a monstrous evil reptilian something which was slithering crawling underneath the surface of our national life, waiting its chance to attempt the closing of its coils.

I shivered involuntarily, glanced at Katherine, and saw that her face was pallid, as I guessed was my own. And then Lillian rose, stuffed the scribbled papers into her bag, moved swiftly toward Katherine, and let her hand fall lightly on the smaller woman's shoulder.

"You've done something for your country this day, girl," she said, and though her voice was so low that it could not have been heard outside the room, there was that in its timbre which rang inspiringly in our ears. "I'm wild to get these into the hands of the only man who can handle them. Have you anything else to tell us?"

"Nothing, except that Anton told Joe to watch for a man with a motor car who would pretend to be his cousin, and who would come for him when he was ready to leave the hospital. He gave Joe this cousin's address, commanded Joe to write when he was permitted to leave, and also asked if he thought the hospital authorities would let him leave more quickly if he took his nurse along. There is evidently no lack of money in the people back of Joe and Anton."

"Get busy, Madge." "No, these isn't," Lillian commented dryly. "What did Joe answer?" Katherine laughed with a trace of embarrassment.

"Joe declared emphatically that he wanted me to go along when he left the hospital, that he wouldn't get well if I didn't, that all other nurses were several different varieties of monkeys, and that I was 'y' un peach.' I told you I had made a conquest."

"That's fine in one way," Lillian answered gravely, "and bad in another. However, I think we may guarantee to keep a watch on Mr. Joe after you leave the hospital with him. It's going to be a risky business going to the house where I think I shall have to send you, but there's at least one other government operative in the house, and others outside, so I think we'll be able to reduce that risk to a minimum."

"I fancy you know I'm rather used to risks' of various kinds," Katherine said quietly.

Isn't so bad on a little sprint. It's on the century runs where Madge shines that I puncture a tire. Here it is."

She repeated a name and the address of a New Jersey town distinctly, as Lillian nodded to me.

"Get busy, Madge," she said, and I accordingly concentrated on what Katherine was repeating, soon had the name and address filed away securely in my memory, and knew that whenever they were needed I could repeat them accurately.

"A Girl in a Thousand."

"That's all I have to tell you," Katherine was saying as I finished, and Lillian moved decisively toward the door as she spoke.

"Then Madge and I will lose no time getting home," she said. "You must have Dr. Pettit take you back to the hospital on the double-quick, also. And I don't need to tell you to keep a sharp lookout and to let me know at once whatever you hear. You're a girl in a thousand, Katherine Bickett, and I don't care who hears me telling you."

I knew that the half-mocking words were praise indeed from Lillian, saw Katherine's face flush with pleasure as she listened. And then Lillian, drawing me with her, hurried through the door and down the steps to the car.

"Step on her, Madge," she commanded. "I'm mighty anxious to get home and have another little confab with dear Katie."
