

ONE ORCHESTRA FOR NATION

By NEA Service. NEW YORK, Sept. 18.—One orchestra may yet supply music to the whole nation...

Projectors have been placed at various points in the ball-room and connected to the set...

Radio Pioneers in Philippines

The five boys standing alongside Gen. Leonard Wood of the Philippines are the pioneers of amateur radio in those islands...

sought his restaurant, where the uniting Lane Arm of Confidence took him by the hand and led him to a table...

But now, Lanyard told himself, one knew what had dragged Dupont in such hot haste to Lyons...

about a quarter after six. There, peering out of the window to identify the station, he was startled to see the broad, round-shouldered back of Albert Dupont...

It was not feasible to dress and pursue, even had it been wise. The newspapers of Paris, that day, had a sensation: in a compartment...

More Truth Than Poetry

AN IMPOSITION. The rats in the United States cost the citizens—man, woman and child—a dollar each, annually.

We seldom arouse about expense in words of futile indignation. There seems to us but little sense in wholly idle protestation.

Demand League Take Hand in New Crisis

GENEVA, Sept. 18.—(By T. P.)—Demands that the League of Nations intervene in the Greco-Turk war were made today in a resolution presented by Nansen...

A TYPEWRITER FURNISHED EVENING STUDENTS AT HOME

Those who enroll in the evening school this month for a stenographic course will be given the free use of a typewriter at their homes...

VERSE O' CHEER

By Edgar L. Jones

The time will come when all the grief and pain we bear today will be forgotten when our share of pleasures come our way.

IT IS A PLEASURE

To call at a place where you can find what you want after all the shopping all around town...

Germany has reason to be grateful in that losing the war she lost Russia along with it.

NOT SO TOUGH. Germany has reason to be grateful in that losing the war she lost Russia along with it.

CHARLES B. SAX & COMPANY

For the Woman Who Sews Here's the Best of News Today's offerings cover the list of sewing needs, trimmings, notions, buttons...

Coatings and Suitings Ready to Be Made Into Fall Garments Imported Ratine, 36 inch, suitable for dresses; colors are green, tan and brown at, yard .89c

Heavy Velour Coatings, 56 inch, in dark green, burgundy and black, special, yard $2.00

New Dress Trimmings Beautiful metallic Flouncing, 36 inch, silver on black, yard $3.50

Notion Specials Skirt Belting, black and white, at yard .8c and 10c

THURSDAY SPECIALS 1,000 PAIRS WOMEN'S PATENT STRAPS—CUBAN, MILITARY AND LOW HEELS!

Black and brown kid lace oxfords, military heels, black satin junior and military heels, all sizes, regular $5 values for Thursday only at this startling low $3.69 price

The Biggest Women's Shoe Values in Town! 1 lot of 72 pairs of women's black and brown lace oxfords. Very classy, indeed, with military heels. Regular price was $3.50. On sale Thursday for only $2.49

144 PAIRS WOMEN'S BLACK KID lace oxfords with military rubber heels. Genuine $4.50 value for only $2.98

MISSES' AND CHILDREN'S brown or black, all solid leather school shoes. We have a complete run of sizes. A very serviceable and stylish shoe for only $1.98

Women's patent, brown or black kid lace oxfords, Goodyear welt soles. Regular $6 values, for Thursday only at $4.98

Low Rent No Delivery No Costly Credit System No Frills

Dimel's 131 North Michigan St. Where Good Shoes Are Sold for Less

Alias the Lone Wolf

by Louis Joseph Vance

© 1922 International Magazine Company

ALIAS THE LONE WOLF For years the brilliant member of the English Secret Service had been known as ANDRE DUCHEMIN. Now to the woman he loved, EVE DE MONTALAIS, he confessed that he was the notorious crackman.

GO ON WITH THE STORY

CHAPTER XI The Lone Wolf Takes The Trail. Early in the afternoon Lanyard examined the safe without exciting comment in the household.

CHAPTER XII Travels With An Assassin. Lanyard, gray with dust and weariness of 20 leagues of heavy walking, trudged into the sleeping streets of the town of Tourneville and purchased a ticket for Lyons.

At Lyons fortune favored Lanyard. The station was well thronged, a circumstance which enabled him to keep inconspicuously close to his victim.

Presently a shabby, furtive little rat of a man nudged his elbow, and Dupont followed him to a corner.

Lanyard secured a berth and went about his business profoundly satisfied. Beyond shades of fair doubt Dupont was up to some new devilment, but Lanyard would be surprised if its nature failed to develop on the train or at least upon his arrival in Paris the next morning.

It was no later than seven in the evening when he left a room which he had engaged in a hotel and left it a changed man.

The pointed beard of Monsieur Duchemin was no more. The rough tressed walking-suit had been replaced by a blue serge. The hair was crisp black ash as in the fireplace of the room which Lanyard had just quitted, all but the letter of credit; and this last was enclosed in an envelope, to be sent to London by registered post with a covering note to request that the unpaid balance be forwarded in French banknotes to Monsieur Paul Martin, general delivery, Paris: Paul Martin being the name which appeared on an entirely new set of papers of identification which Lanyard had thoughtfully secreted in the lining of the tweed coat before leaving London.

Lanyard had testimony to the thoroughness of the transformation in his looks twice within an hour. The first was when, leaving the hotel, he found himself suddenly face to face with Dupont. The heady little eyes of the thus comprehended him in a glance, and rejected him as of positively no interest to Albert Dupont, a complete stranger and a cheap one at that. He re-entered the hotel and hips, yet shook her head.

"Monsieur forgets I learned to know him under the name of Duchemin."

"If madame, in her charity, means to continue to know me, it must be Michael Lanyard whom she suffers to claim a little portion of her friendship."

"More than a little, monsieur, more than a little 'friendship' only!"

"I know no way to thank you," he managed to say at last.

"For what?"

"For everything—kindness, charity, sympathy."

"What are these things?" she demanded with a nervous little laugh. "Words! Just words that you and I use to hide behind, like timid children..."

"But I don't think it's any use, my friend, I'm quite sure that neither of us is deceived. No, say nothing more; the time is not yet and—we both can wait. Only know I understand.... Go now—her fingers tightened round his—but don't stay away any longer than you must, don't be influenced by silly traditions, false and foolish standards when you think of me. Go now—she freed her hand and turned away—but oh, come safely back to me, my dear!"

CHAPTER XII Travels With An Assassin.

Lanyard, gray with dust and weariness of 20 leagues of heavy walking, trudged into the sleeping streets of the town of Tourneville and purchased a ticket for Lyons.

As the engine began to snort, a man darted from behind the tiny structure that housed the ticket-office, galloped heavily across the platform, and with nothing to spare threw himself into the compartment immediately behind Lanyard.

This maneuver was performed so unexpectedly that Lanyard caught barely a glimpse of the fellow; but one glimpse was enough. It was Monsieur Albert Dupont who had failed to assassinate the then Andre Duchemin more than three weeks ago.

At Lyons fortune favored Lanyard. The station was well thronged, a circumstance which enabled him to keep inconspicuously close to his victim. Furthermore, Dupont was obviously looking for somebody, and so distracted.

Presently a shabby, furtive little rat of a man nudged his elbow, and Dupont followed him to a corner.

Lanyard secured a berth and went about his business profoundly satisfied. Beyond shades of fair doubt Dupont was up to some new devilment, but Lanyard would be surprised if its nature failed to develop on the train or at least upon his arrival in Paris the next morning.

It was no later than seven in the evening when he left a room which he had engaged in a hotel and left it a changed man.

The pointed beard of Monsieur Duchemin was no more. The rough tressed walking-suit had been replaced by a blue serge. The hair was crisp black ash as in the fireplace of the room which Lanyard had just quitted, all but the letter of credit; and this last was enclosed in an envelope, to be sent to London by registered post with a covering note to request that the unpaid balance be forwarded in French banknotes to Monsieur Paul Martin, general delivery, Paris: Paul Martin being the name which appeared on an entirely new set of papers of identification which Lanyard had thoughtfully secreted in the lining of the tweed coat before leaving London.

Lanyard had testimony to the thoroughness of the transformation in his looks twice within an hour. The first was when, leaving the hotel, he found himself suddenly face to face with Dupont. The heady little eyes of the thus comprehended him in a glance, and rejected him as of positively no interest to Albert Dupont, a complete stranger and a cheap one at that. He re-entered the hotel and

hips, yet shook her head.

"Monsieur forgets I learned to know him under the name of Duchemin."

"If madame, in her charity, means to continue to know me, it must be Michael Lanyard whom she suffers to claim a little portion of her friendship."

"More than a little, monsieur, more than a little 'friendship' only!"

"I know no way to thank you," he managed to say at last.

"For what?"

"For everything—kindness, charity, sympathy."

"What are these things?" she demanded with a nervous little laugh. "Words! Just words that you and I use to hide behind, like timid children..."

"But I don't think it's any use, my friend, I'm quite sure that neither of us is deceived. No, say nothing more; the time is not yet and—we both can wait. Only know I understand.... Go now—her fingers tightened round his—but don't stay away any longer than you must, don't be influenced by silly traditions, false and foolish standards when you think of me. Go now—she freed her hand and turned away—but oh, come safely back to me, my dear!"

CHAPTER XII Travels With An Assassin.

Lanyard, gray with dust and weariness of 20 leagues of heavy walking, trudged into the sleeping streets of the town of Tourneville and purchased a ticket for Lyons.

As the engine began to snort, a man darted from behind the tiny structure that housed the ticket-office, galloped heavily across the platform, and with nothing to spare threw himself into the compartment immediately behind Lanyard.

This maneuver was performed so unexpectedly that Lanyard caught barely a glimpse of the fellow; but one glimpse was enough. It was Monsieur Albert Dupont who had failed to assassinate the then Andre Duchemin more than three weeks ago.

At Lyons fortune favored Lanyard. The station was well thronged, a circumstance which enabled him to keep inconspicuously close to his victim. Furthermore, Dupont was obviously looking for somebody, and so distracted.

Presently a shabby, furtive little rat of a man nudged his elbow, and Dupont followed him to a corner.

Lanyard secured a berth and went about his business profoundly satisfied. Beyond shades of fair doubt Dupont was up to some new devilment, but Lanyard would be surprised if its nature failed to develop on the train or at least upon his arrival in Paris the next morning.

It was no later than seven in the evening when he left a room which he had engaged in a hotel and left it a changed man.

The pointed beard of Monsieur Duchemin was no more. The rough tressed walking-suit had been replaced by a blue serge. The hair was crisp black ash as in the fireplace of the room which Lanyard had just quitted, all but the letter of credit; and this last was enclosed in an envelope, to be sent to London by registered post with a covering note to request that the unpaid balance be forwarded in French banknotes to Monsieur Paul Martin, general delivery, Paris: Paul Martin being the name which appeared on an entirely new set of papers of identification which Lanyard had thoughtfully secreted in the lining of the tweed coat before leaving London.

Lanyard had testimony to the thoroughness of the transformation in his looks twice within an hour. The first was when, leaving the hotel, he found himself suddenly face to face with Dupont. The heady little eyes of the thus comprehended him in a glance, and rejected him as of positively no interest to Albert Dupont, a complete stranger and a cheap one at that. He re-entered the hotel and

hips, yet shook her head.

"Monsieur forgets I learned to know him under the name of Duchemin."

"If madame, in her charity, means to continue to know me, it must be Michael Lanyard whom she suffers to claim a little portion of her friendship."

"More than a little, monsieur, more than a little 'friendship' only!"

"I know no way to thank you," he managed to say at last.

"For what?"

"For everything—kindness, charity, sympathy."

"What are these things?" she demanded with a nervous little laugh. "Words! Just words that you and I use to hide behind, like timid children..."

"But I don't think it's any use, my friend, I'm quite sure that neither of us is deceived. No, say nothing more; the time is not yet and—we both can wait. Only know I understand.... Go now—her fingers tightened round his—but don't stay away any longer than you must, don't be influenced by silly traditions, false and foolish standards when you think of me. Go now—she freed her hand and turned away—but oh, come safely back to me, my dear!"

CHAPTER XII Travels With An Assassin.

Lanyard, gray with dust and weariness of 20 leagues of heavy walking, trudged into the sleeping streets of the town of Tourneville and purchased a ticket for Lyons.

As the engine began to snort, a man darted from behind the tiny structure that housed the ticket-office, galloped heavily across the platform, and with nothing to spare threw himself into the compartment immediately behind Lanyard.

This maneuver was performed so unexpectedly that Lanyard caught barely a glimpse of the fellow; but one glimpse was enough. It was Monsieur Albert Dupont who had failed to assassinate the then Andre Duchemin more than three weeks ago.

At Lyons fortune favored Lanyard. The station was well thronged, a circumstance which enabled him to keep inconspicuously close to his victim. Furthermore, Dupont was obviously looking for somebody, and so distracted.

Presently a shabby, furtive little rat of a man nudged his elbow, and Dupont followed him to a corner.

Lanyard secured a berth and went about his business profoundly satisfied. Beyond shades of fair doubt Dupont was up to some new devilment, but Lanyard would be surprised if its nature failed to develop on the train or at least upon his arrival in Paris the next morning.

It was no later than seven in the evening when he left a room which he had engaged in a hotel and left it a changed man.

The pointed beard of Monsieur Duchemin was no more. The rough tressed walking-suit had been replaced by a blue serge. The hair was crisp black ash as in the fireplace of the room which Lanyard had just quitted, all but the letter of credit; and this last was enclosed in an envelope, to be sent to London by registered post with a covering note to request that the unpaid balance be forwarded in French banknotes to Monsieur Paul Martin, general delivery, Paris: Paul Martin being the name which appeared on an entirely new set of papers of identification which Lanyard had thoughtfully secreted in the lining of the tweed coat before leaving London.

Lanyard had testimony to the thoroughness of the transformation in his looks twice within an hour. The first was when, leaving the hotel, he found himself suddenly face to face with Dupont. The heady little eyes of the thus comprehended him in a glance, and rejected him as of positively no interest to Albert Dupont, a complete stranger and a cheap one at that. He re-entered the hotel and

hips, yet shook her head.

"Monsieur forgets I learned to know him under the name of Duchemin."

"If madame, in her charity, means to continue to know me, it must be Michael Lanyard whom she suffers to claim a little portion of her friendship."

"More than a little, monsieur, more than a little 'friendship' only!"

"I know no way to thank you," he managed to say at last.

"For what?"

"For everything—kindness, charity, sympathy."

"What are these things?" she demanded with a nervous little laugh. "Words! Just words that you and I use to hide behind, like timid children..."

"But I don't think it's any use, my friend, I'm quite sure that neither of us is deceived. No, say nothing more; the time is not yet and—we both can wait. Only know I understand.... Go now—her fingers tightened round his—but don't stay away any longer than you must, don't be influenced by silly traditions, false and foolish standards when you think of me. Go now—she freed her hand and turned away—but oh, come safely back to me, my dear!"

CHAPTER XII Travels With An Assassin.

Lanyard, gray with dust and weariness of 20 leagues of heavy walking, trudged into the sleeping streets of the town of Tourneville and purchased a ticket for Lyons.

As the engine began to snort, a man darted from behind the tiny structure that housed the ticket-office, galloped heavily across the platform, and with nothing to spare threw himself into the compartment immediately behind Lanyard.

This maneuver was performed so unexpectedly that Lanyard caught barely a glimpse of the fellow; but one glimpse was enough. It was Monsieur Albert Dupont who had failed to assassinate the then Andre Duchemin more than three weeks ago.

At Lyons fortune favored Lanyard. The station was well thronged, a circumstance which enabled him to keep inconspicuously close to his victim. Furthermore, Dupont was obviously looking for somebody, and so distracted.

Presently a shabby, furtive little rat of a man nudged his elbow, and Dupont followed him to a corner.

Lanyard secured a berth and went about his business profoundly satisfied. Beyond shades of fair doubt Dupont was up to some new devilment, but Lanyard would be surprised if its nature failed to develop on the train or at least upon his arrival in Paris the next morning.

It was no later than seven in the evening when he left a room which he had engaged in a hotel and left it a changed man.

The pointed beard of Monsieur Duchemin was no more. The rough tressed walking-suit had been replaced by a blue serge. The hair was crisp black ash as in the fireplace of the room which Lanyard had just quitted, all but the letter of credit; and this last was enclosed in an envelope, to be sent to London by registered post with a covering note to request that the unpaid balance be forwarded in French banknotes to Monsieur Paul Martin, general delivery, Paris: Paul Martin being the name which appeared on an entirely new set of papers of identification which Lanyard had thoughtfully secreted in the lining of the tweed coat before leaving London.

Lanyard had testimony to the thoroughness of the transformation in his looks twice within an hour. The first was when, leaving the hotel, he found himself suddenly face to face with Dupont. The heady little eyes of the thus comprehended him in a glance, and rejected him as of positively no interest to Albert Dupont, a complete stranger and a cheap one at that. He re-entered the hotel and

hips, yet shook her head.

"Monsieur forgets I learned to know him under the name of Duchemin."

"If madame, in her charity, means to continue to know me, it must be Michael Lanyard whom she suffers to claim a little portion of her friendship."

"More than a little, monsieur, more than a little 'friendship' only!"

"I know no way to thank you," he managed to say at last.

"For what?"

"For everything—kindness, charity, sympathy."

"What are these things?" she demanded with a nervous little laugh. "Words! Just words that you and I use to hide behind, like timid children..."

"But I don't think it's any use, my friend, I'm quite sure that neither of us is deceived. No, say nothing more; the time is not yet and—we both can wait. Only know I understand.... Go now—her fingers tightened round his—but don't stay away any longer than you must, don't be influenced by silly traditions, false and foolish standards when you think of me. Go now—she freed her hand and turned away—but oh, come safely back to me, my dear!"

CHAPTER XII Travels With An Assassin.

Lanyard, gray with dust and weariness of 20 leagues of heavy walking, trudged into the sleeping streets of the town of Tourneville and purchased a ticket for Lyons.

As the engine began to snort, a man darted from behind the tiny structure that housed the ticket-office, galloped heavily across the platform, and with nothing to spare threw himself into the compartment immediately behind Lanyard.

This maneuver was performed so unexpectedly that Lanyard caught barely a glimpse of the fellow; but one glimpse was enough. It was Monsieur Albert Dupont who had failed to assassinate the then Andre Duchemin more than three weeks ago.

At Lyons fortune favored Lanyard. The station was well thronged, a circumstance which enabled him to keep inconspicuously close to his victim. Furthermore, Dupont was obviously looking for somebody, and so distracted.

Presently a shabby, furtive little rat of a man nudged his elbow, and Dupont followed him to a corner.

Lanyard secured a berth and went about his business profoundly satisfied. Beyond shades of fair doubt Dupont was up to some new devilment, but Lanyard would be surprised if its nature failed to develop on the train or at least upon his arrival in Paris the next morning.

It was no later than seven in the evening when he left a room which he had engaged in a hotel and left it a changed man.

The pointed beard of Monsieur Duchemin was no more. The rough tressed walking-suit had been replaced by a blue serge. The hair was crisp black ash as in the fireplace of the room which Lanyard had just quitted, all but the letter of credit; and this last was enclosed in an envelope, to be sent to London by registered post with a covering note to request that the unpaid balance be forwarded in French banknotes to Monsieur Paul Martin, general delivery, Paris: Paul Martin being the name which appeared on an entirely new set of papers of identification which Lanyard had thoughtfully secreted in the lining of the tweed coat before leaving London.

Lanyard had testimony to the thoroughness of the transformation in his looks twice within an hour. The first was when, leaving the hotel, he found himself suddenly face to face with Dupont. The heady little eyes of the thus comprehended him in a glance, and rejected him as of positively no interest to Albert Dupont, a complete stranger and a cheap one at that. He re-entered the hotel and

hips, yet shook her head.

"Monsieur forgets I learned to know him under the name of Duchemin."

"If madame, in her charity, means to continue to know me, it must be Michael Lanyard whom she suffers to claim a little portion of her friendship."

"More than a little, monsieur, more than a little 'friendship' only!"

"I know no way to thank you," he managed to say at last.

"For what?"

"For everything—kindness, charity, sympathy."

"What are these things?" she demanded with a nervous little laugh. "Words! Just words that you and I use to hide behind, like timid children..."

"But I don't think it's any use, my friend, I'm quite sure that neither of us is deceived. No, say nothing more; the time is not yet and—we both can wait. Only know I understand.... Go now—her fingers tightened round his—but don't stay away any longer than you must, don't be influenced by silly traditions, false and foolish standards when you think of me. Go now—she freed her hand and turned away—but oh, come safely back to me, my dear!"

CHAPTER XII Travels With An Assassin.

Lanyard, gray with dust and weariness of 20 leagues of heavy walking, trudged into the sleeping streets of the town of Tourneville and purchased a ticket for Lyons.

As the engine began to snort, a man darted from behind the tiny structure that housed the ticket-office, galloped heavily across the platform, and with nothing to spare threw himself into the compartment immediately behind Lanyard.

This maneuver was performed so unexpectedly that Lanyard caught barely a glimpse of the fellow; but one glimpse was enough. It was Monsieur Albert Dupont who had failed to assassinate the then Andre Duchemin more than three weeks ago.

At Lyons fortune favored Lanyard. The station was well thronged, a circumstance which enabled him to keep inconspicuously close to his victim. Furthermore, Dupont was obviously looking for somebody, and so distracted.

Presently a shabby, furtive little rat of a man nudged his elbow, and Dupont followed him to a corner.

Lanyard secured a berth and went about his business profoundly satisfied. Beyond shades of fair doubt Dupont was up to some new devilment, but Lanyard would be surprised if its nature failed to develop on the train or at least upon his arrival in Paris the next morning.

It was no later than seven in the evening when he left a room which he had engaged in a hotel and left it a changed man.

The pointed beard of Monsieur Duchemin was no more. The rough tressed walking-suit had been replaced by a blue serge. The hair was crisp black ash as in the fireplace of the room which Lanyard had just quitted, all but the letter of credit; and this last was enclosed in an envelope, to be sent to London by registered post with a covering note to request that the unpaid balance be forwarded in French banknotes to Monsieur Paul Martin, general delivery, Paris: Paul Martin being the name which appeared on an entirely new set of papers of identification which Lanyard had thoughtfully secreted in the lining of the tweed coat before leaving London.

Lanyard had testimony to the thoroughness of the transformation in his looks twice within an hour. The first was when, leaving the hotel, he found himself suddenly face to face with Dupont. The heady little eyes of the thus comprehended him in a glance, and rejected him as of positively no interest to Albert Dupont, a complete stranger and a cheap one at that. He re-entered the hotel and

hips, yet shook her head.

"Monsieur forgets I learned to know him under the name of Duchemin."

"If madame, in her charity, means to continue to know me, it must be Michael Lanyard whom she suffers to claim a little portion of her friendship."

"More than a little, monsieur, more than a little 'friendship' only!"

"I know no way to thank you," he managed to say at last.

"For what?"

"For everything—kindness, charity, sympathy."

"What are these things?" she demanded with a nervous little laugh. "Words! Just words that you and I use to hide behind, like timid children..."