

BEGIN LIVING IT

It is pretty generally realized nowadays that more than a book of rules is necessary in order to establish real community spirit. And it is out of that realization that Community Service has grown.

Social students tell us that the spirit of their neighborhood vanishes in proportion as the number of people gathered in any one community increases. That, of course, is due to the fact that, as a community increases in numbers, contact tends to become casual. The neighborhood spirit is subject to the limitations of the market place, the counting room, the office, the factory. Obviously, in order to promote the spirit of the neighborhood, the neighborhood must first be established. The spirit of the neighborhood cannot thrive when disembodied. Ours is a world in which disembodied spirits cannot be rated as effective agents. For that reason Community Service holds that the way to establish community life is to begin living it.

Community Service, with the background and experience of the Playground and Recreation Association and of War Camp Community Service, is driving home the value of organized community recreation; and insisting on the cardinal principle that the way to establish community life is to begin living it.

Making the Shoe Fit the Foot

ONE of the outstanding features of the efficiency of the Standard Oil Company (Indiana) is its ability to expand to meet conditions.

In 1919 there were 1,434,909 more motor vehicles in the United States than in 1918.

This enormous increase in automotive power made necessary a vast increase of distribution facilities in order that your car, wherever it might be, should never lose its usefulness because of an empty gasoline tank.

The Standard Oil Company (Indiana) anticipated this increasing demand and met it amply in the eleven states it serves with a fleet of 4300 motor trucks, a caravan of horse-drawn wagons, and a little army of 530,000 iron barrels, so that even in remote districts no tractor, truck or pleasure car, need be without fuel at any time.

Take into consideration the fact that of the 1,434,909 new motor vehicles put into service in 1919, approximately 573,961 went to farms, and you will appreciate the necessity for this vast distributive system.

The Standard Oil Company (Indiana) appreciates that the automobile has passed from the realm of luxury and has become an essential, and that gasoline to run it has become an industrial necessity.

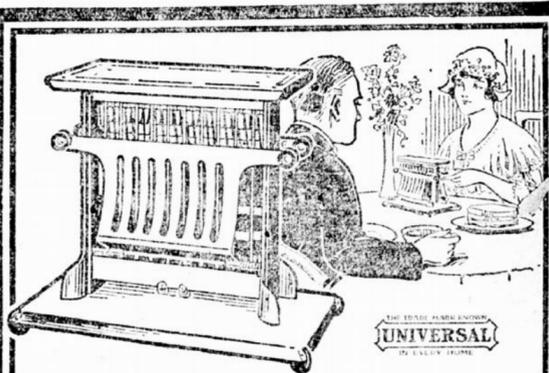

The Company takes pride in the fact that it has met this need in the spirit of service, that it has been keen in anticipating the wants of the public, and efficient in satisfying them through the most perfect distribution system in the world.
