Lid Weighs Something Like 150 to 200 Pounds and Employe Narrowly Escaped Death by This Accident

Otto Anschutz, machinist for the U. S. government at Keokuk, had a narrow escape from death yesterday when the iron lid to a pit or manhole under a capstan fell on him, crushing his face to the cement flooring of the pit. Mr. Anschutz sustained a broken nose and other serious injuries about the face, and is suffering from the shock. He was removed to Graham hospital and according to the report of the attending physician, is resting somewhat easier today.

Mr. Anschutz went down into the pit or manhole under a capstan at the government lock here to do some repair work. While he was in the pit under the wall, the heavy iron lid, weighing 150 to 200 pounds, fell on him. The weight struck him in the back of the head and pinned him to the floor, his face striking against the cement.

His nose was broken and there ere injuries to his cheek bones. Only slight injuries were found on head. The shock was severe and he is suffering greatly from this. It is said that had the door struck him in the side of the head, death would have
