The Glass Milk Jar Declared Dangerous to Public Health.

(Board's Dairyman.) The Milk Inspector of the city of Philadelphia claims that the use by milkmen of the individual glass jar, which has recently come into general use, is far more dangerous to the public health than was the old custom of dealing out the milk from the common tin can. It is stated as a fact that the authorities at the West Point Military Academy have forbidden the use of glass bottles or jars for the reason that some recent cases of fever among the cadets were traced directly to this mode of milk distribution.

The explanation of the phenomenon is that the glass jars are taken into all sorts of houses without regard to what diseases may exist there, and are redistributed the next day to different houses. Whenever a glass jar is taken into a house where there is infectious diseases, it is sure to be laden within and without by the germs of the disease, and the jar is equally sure not to be sterilized. Water sufficiently hot to kill the germs cannot be used to cleanse the jars without too great danger of breakage. The consequence, it is alleged, is that as a fact the jars are hardly ever sufficiently sterilized.
