TOBACCO STEMS AND STALKS

These Can Be Used as Valuable Fertilizers by Tobacco Growers.

According to the United States department of agriculture, should the demand of Europe for American tobacco stems cause these stems, which contain large quantities of plant food, especially potash, may be used to good advantage by the American grower as tobacco fertilizer. Soil fertilized by these stems secured from the cigar and tobacco factories and stemmeries will produce leaf tobacco of better burning qualities and texture.

Tobacco stems as fertilizer should be applied in smaller quantities than manure, because they contain larger quantities of the constituents which feed the plant, according to the department's tobacco specialists. Two tons per acre of "seed stems" (stems from cigar factories) or two and one-half tons of "Kentucky stems" (stems from the tobacco factories and stemmeries) are known to give good results in New England, and so far as available these stems will undoubtedly furnish a very satisfactory source of potash, as well as other plant foods, in other tobacco sections.

Considerable quantities of tobacco stems have long been exported to Germany and other parts of Europe, where they are often used in the manufacture of low grade smoking tobacco and as a source of nicotine.

Tobacco stalks which are not removed from the farm under prevailing methods are not always used to the best advantage as a fertilizer. Like the stems, they contain considerable quantities of valuable plant food (though not so much) and may be used freely as a fertilizer for tobacco and other crops. They may be profitably used to improve the hay lot by simply spreading the stalks over the land in the fall, or they may be plowed under at the same season for cultivated crops, such as cotton, corn, tobacco, etc. The practice of piling tobacco stalks in heaps and leaving them exposed to the weather means a waste of valuable material that might be returned to the soil.

Bureau Established to Take Up Feminine End of Farm Toil.

A department of domestic science has been established in connection with the Erie county farm bureau of the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce, says the American City. The plans of the bureau provide for doing for women and girls on the farm, within their possible range of activities, work similar to that which is being done through the medium of farm bureaus for men and boys upon the farm within the range of their well defined lines of operation. There is this difference, however, between the operations of the department of domestic science and the farm bureau proper: the latter has been tried out in many of its essential possibilities, with the result that waste effort has been eliminated, and the work now being undertaken by a properly equipped farm bureau is carried on in accordance with well established rules, well defined policies and on a scientific basis. The domestic science department, on the contrary, goes into a virgin field without knowledge gained through previous experience and must work out its own salvation to the last detail.

The fact has been recognized for many years that one of the principal handicaps to successful farming has been the failure heretofore to give proper consideration to the women's end of farm work. There is probably no business undertaking in which men and women co-operate more closely than they do in farming, yet despite the fact that the national government and the governments of practically every commonwealth in the nation have spent large sums of money in furthering the progress of agriculture through the medium of the farmer and his son, thus far comparatively little has been devoted to similar work with regard to the farmer's wife and her daughter.
