Dwellers in Mountains of Tyrol Live in Much the Same Way as Did Their Ancestors.

The mountains of Tyrol shelter one of the few remaining unspoiled peasant people of Europe—a people that wears a native costume, remembers its folk legends and follows customs centuries old.

The mountain Tyrolese are robust, hard-working folk. Life in the mountains demands work from every member of the household from daybreak until after dark. Then, on winter nights, the Tyrolese peasants play.

Dancing is a favorite amusement after the day's work, and this is all the more surprising because the dances of Tyrol are more strenuous than those of Russia or Poland. To swing your partner up to the ceiling, and to fall down and spring up again without using the hands for support are among the "steps" of a good dancer's repertoire.

While the dancing couple excitedly swing and caper, the others sing and play the dither, the favorite Tyrolese musical instrument. Original songs are in high favor, and also the old folk songs of princes and peasants, shepherdesses and huntsmen. The peasants sing lustily and well. Only a realization of tomorrow's work puts an end to the affair, and sends guests trooping home still whistling or humming the last song.

HOUNDS COULD NOT FORGET

Faithful Animals Long Remembered—Young Master Who Met Tragic Death a Year Ago.

It has often been said that a "dog is a man's best friend." This has certainly proved true in the case of Johnny Ingram, a fifteen-year-old boy, who froze to death during the big snowstorm about a year ago on the banks of Spring river, says a Stillwater (Okla.) dispatch.

When the body of the unfortunate boy was found two large greyhounds sat shivering in the snow guarding their young master's remains from wolves and other wild beasts.

After the boy's burial the two faithful hounds would make almost daily trips out to the cemetery and sit for hours at his grave. On these days they would not partake of a bite to eat until they returned to the Ingram home.

Many have followed the dogs to the cemetery out of curiosity to see what they would do. They were often found lying there, one on each side of the grave, their heads between their paws, as if in silent prayer.

Last summer the dogs were seen to gather wild pansies and daisies in their mouths and trot off toward the cemetery, where they would deposit the flowers upon the boy's grave. These flowers were favorites with the lad. About a month ago the two dogs appeared to be sick.

A veterinary surgeon was called from Stillwater, but after examining the dogs he declared that he could find nothing wrong with them. However, they still refused to eat and finally disappeared.
