A SINGULAR ACCIDENT.

A Train of Cars Effected Rapidly from the Track by a Powerful Explosion and Applied Several Persons Injured, but None Fatally.

A very remarkable railroad accident occurred near Georgetown, Cal., on Saturday. The Denver-bound passenger train on the Colorado Central Railroad was completely blown from the track by the wind.

The train, consisting of the engine, baggage-car and two coaches, left the depot at Georgetown at a time when a pretty good gale was blowing, with thirteen passengers on board.

At a point a mile out of the city the wind had increased almost to a hurricane. The train men were fearful of the accident and slowed the train.

Ahead was a high grade, and it was resolved not to run it till the wind had ceased. The train was running very slow when the accident occurred.

Several times the cars toppled when the gusts came more violently, but it was thought that the train would be blown away, and when the train came to a stop the passengers were more or less prepared for it.

The passenger coaches were the first to go. They turned over twice. The baggage-car alighted but the engine was on the track.
