FANCIES OF FASHION
 Season Seems to Be Given Over to Ethereal Fabrics.

Chantilly Lace, Chiffon, and Soft Spotted Materials of Every Kind Are in Great Demand—Some Dainty Gowns.

(Special Chicago Letter.)
 IT IS getting more and more difficult with each passing hour to adequately describe the beautiful and luxurious fashions of the season.

Take, for instance, the up-to-date summer gowns now on exhibition at the leading shops. All that I have seen thus far have displayed a wonderfully intricate mass of fine tucking and puffing, shirring and plaiting, to say nothing of the vast amount of exquisite handwork that appears on both shirt and bodice, and anything like an accurate description of their manifold charms seems an impossibility.

These gowns are essentially summer ones, and the season of 1901 seems to be given over entirely to ethereal fabrics, with lace and chiffon perhaps playing the most important part of all.

There is a perfect craze at the present moment for black chantilly lace, draped over white chiffon, and the possibilities of this artistic combination are indeed great. While on the face of it I am bound to confess it sounds extravagant, such a gown, if properly fashioned, will be an ideal one for evening wear throughout the entire winter season.

The rage for spotted materials has not abated in the least, and it is safe to predict its continued popularity for the remainder of the summer. The fabric of this description most sought after at present is of a soft, silky texture, showing a cream ground dotted all over with medium-sized black spots, and, while not at all pretty, it is pronounced exceedingly smart-looking. To my mind it is too dazzling for general wear, but as it has the air of novelty, besides being decidedly French in appearance, it is likely to remain a favorite for some time at least.

Fashionable dressmakers are still fashioning their handsomest summer gowns of crepe de chine and foulards of every description, trimmed with any quantity of lace and ribbon velvet. Many women complain bitterly of the price of crepe de chine, but it is really a good investment, for no fabric cleans more beautifully, and when the powers of the cleaner have been entirely exhausted the dyer's art can slender leave the dainty white frock to those who can better afford the luxury, consoling yourself with the well-known fact that white is sometimes trying and always accentuates every imperfection of form or feature. A few Japanese muslins have made their appearance. They are very beautiful to look upon, but the designs are inclined to be large and somewhat sprawling, and therefore require the most careful treatment. Good results can only be attained by the skillful touch of the artistic dressmaker.

Nothing could be more fetching than the blouse waist of the moment, no matter of what material it may be fashioned. The swellest looking are made of China silk, mounted over a taffeta silk lining, cut to pouch slightly in front, and elaborately trimmed with yards of line-colored lace. Others again are of the ever-popular crepe de chine, very handsome indeed, while not a few desirable models are made of silk mull in both pure white and delicately tinted colors.

The glory of the all-lace blouse has not departed by any manner of means. In fact, popularity seems rather to wax than wane. The newest blouses of this description are fashioned of white or black lace, draped over chiffon of a corresponding color, and trimmed very sparingly with lace and narrow ribbon velvet.

I make mention of the fact that many of the smart-looking blouses are made without collars, the neck being prettily finished by a frill of soft lace or a narrow band of velvet. After becoming accustomed to this comfortable neck dressing it hardly seems credible that any sane woman ever wore high, choking collars, canvas lined, and of the most unyielding description, on her pretty summer gowns. If collars are used at all nowadays they must be soft and transparent, and I very much doubt if we ever return with good grace to stiff buckram, whatever Dame Fashion may in the future decree.

Sleeves continue to be an interesting topic in the world of fashion. The new sleeve is either very long or very short, and in either case is made without that rather objectionable puff near the wrist, of which, by the way, we are all distinctly tired. I rather like the shorter sleeve in the real summer frock, provided, of course, the wearer have a pretty arm. Whether the slight puffiness above the elbow seen on many of the newest sleeves will lead to an exaggerated fullness later on remains to be seen, but for this season at least we are not likely to suffer from something very outre.

Traveling coats this year are charming and quite inexpensive as compared to those of last season. There is a strong feeling just now in favor of the linen coat, cut either in empire or princess style. Linen is quite a relief after the alpaca of other seasons, which material always seemed to me utterly lacking in style. Other traveling wraps are made of plaited glaze silk, rather elaborately trimmed with insertions of eluzy lace.

Speaking of traveling coats one's thoughts naturally turn in the direction of holiday making, when prominent among the necessary items of our outfits will be a neatly made and becoming bathing dress.

These dresses nowadays are given as much care in the making as any other garment, and are procurable in several different styles and at very moderate cost. The most popular style this season is made in the Junie and knickerbocker shape, fashioned of serge and trimmed with several rows of braid. The favorite color is navy blue, with white braid trimming, although the charms of dull red serge with braidings of black are not to be despised.

The millinery of the hour is delightful; its chief charm to my mind being found in its exquisite sweeping curves. Romney and Gainsborough shapes are the order of the day, and these are of course always trimmed with long drooping plumes. Very quaint are the new rosettes on the summer toque. They are made of soft silk and look like huge mushrooms perched on the side of the crown, and while not at all pretty are considered chic in the extreme. Flat shapes are much in vogue, and as they are quite popular will probably be worn throughout the early fall.

Much of the success of a becoming hat depends upon the way the hair is dressed, and just now Dame Fashion decrees it shall be dressed in the low simple style of years gone by. But no hard and fast rules are laid down, and if it is more becoming to wear the hair dressed high it is permissible to do so. Waving is still in vogue, but it is not exaggerated, and as nearly resembles the natural thing as possible.

The most desirable result cannot be achieved unless one is prepared to expend what would buy two ordinary dresses, so if your purse be miserably stretched, you may as well buy one of the new styles of hats, and wear it with a simple dress, as to buy a hat and a dress, and wear the hat with a simple dress, and the dress with a hat.

It is a good idea to buy a hat and a dress, and wear the hat with a simple dress, and the dress with a hat.
