VAUDEVILLE COMING TO PRINCESS FRIDAY

Among the acts of vaudeville which are to be seen at the Princess Friday and Saturday is the mysterious performance of Genesta, who is on the card as "the wonder of wonders."

He claims to be able to escape from a barrel of water after being securely handcuffed, then placed in a large oak barrel which has been previously filled with water. The lid of the barrel is composed of a 12-inch square cut out and fitted with hinges and handles. All is secured with a monster padlock. The barrel will be in front of the theatre subject to inspection at all times but when used on the stage a committee will be allowed to inspect it, see that it is filled with water, handcuff Genesta, place him in the barrel and lock down the lid.

To fail to effect an escape in one minute will mean to meet with a drowning death. Scientists claim that in ancient India the priests after lifelong study and concentration seemed to have the ability while under hypnotic control, to be able to cause their bodies to ascend and float in midair, slowly disappear and even to be projected through walls of stone and again materialize, to the awe and bewilderment of those who beheld this wonderful phenomena. Has Genesta discovered this ancient secret or does he depend upon modern trickery? See him at the Princess Friday and Saturday.

POLITICAL HUNTING Mr. Editor: As the hunting season is approaching, allow me to warn the hunters that while it is all right to prod a hole to locate a skunk, yet be sure that the prod hasn't sharp point. The stench is sufficient without making the varmint squeal so it can be heard in the next county. This I learn while skunk-hunting lately.

Though I regret that your senior editor did not consult the Ancient Boss when aspiring to the position to which he has been appointed. What though he may have been directed to make the annual pilgrimage "to see pa," the sacrificial offering would be well worth the price of peace in the party ranks.

Trusting there will be sufficient stone road contracts and public utility franchises at stake to insure any particular boss who commercializes his personal and political prestige, with a livelihood, I remain Yours truly, Frank S. Ham

STORIES OF AMERICA AND AMERICANS

A Turkey Shoot at Harvard College in 1821. The Boy From Kentucky who was a Marksman.

This is a true story of an affair at Harvard College over a century ago. The hero was one Larz Anderson, a lad of Kentucky and later a resident of Cincinnati. The original narrator was Josiah Quincy, of the class of 1821 of Harvard, who took the incident from his journals.

Larz was a flaxen haired boy, says Quincy, and traveled all the way to Cambridge from Kentucky on horseback with two companions. The baggage of the trio was borne in saddle bags behind the riders. This mode of travel was the only way to make the journey there, as the roads were such that the trip by public conveyance was impossible.

The scene of the story is laid on the site of Oxford street, Cambridge, later a very decorous thoroughfare not adapted to target shooting, with a turkey as the target, who the students frequently, at that time made their sport. They stood with their backs to the site of old Memorial Hall and discharged their rifles at a turkey just discernible at long range. The turkey was the meat of any student who happened to hit it, which was seldom. But the chance offered was attractive to the young fathers, such sport is an easy game.

One day a little light haired unassuming lad appeared at the lists to try his luck. He seemed such a novice that the master of ceremonies felt called upon to show him how to load the gun. After those preliminary instructions, young Larz was taken aim and to the astonishment of the man, down dropped the turkey. But thinking it an accident he smilingly bid the boy to try his hand again and over was bowled a second bird and I am not sure but a third, to make a feast for the students.

"Well where in"—the United States—"did you come from?" exclaimed the owner of the turkey, who saw in Larz a player capable of "breaking the bank."

"I came from the state of Kentucky, Sir," answered Larz Anderson, bringing himself to a great height as possible, "and remember Sir, with the teachings in this manly pastime we have had from our forefathers, such sport is an easy game."
