Stories of Success

HORACE GREELEY

A name that will live long after writers and statesmen of greater pretension are forgotten is that of the noble founder of the New York Tribune. Premier of editors and first to establish the one-cent newspaper, the most famous figure in American journalism was Horace Greeley. All through life his aim was to promote the good and prevent the bad. He supported every movement which seemed to tend toward right and justice. He abhorred debt. "If you have but fifty cents," said this great man, "buy a peck of corn, parch it and live on it rather than owe a dollar. The young man who early begins to save is fairly on the road to wealth. A savings account is better than the reputation of being a spender. Deposits of one dollar and upwards are received here, and with interest compounded semi-annually it is remarkable how your savings account will increase. Start today and tomorrow thank yourself.
