SUCCESS. Success weaps with the breath of heaven. Amidst those thunders that the lightning smites Thy victory, yet thou canst not surely know. For we, all, live swimmers in the sea. Piled on the top of a huge wave of fate, Which hangs uncertain to which side to fall, And a letter it will leave us up to land, Or whether it will fill us with the sea. Back out to sea, to the deep waves of death, We know not, and no search will make to know: Only the event will teach us, - Matthew Arnold.

TRAINING VETERINARY STUDENTS. A Surgeon on the Subject - Treatment of Dogs in Hot Weather.

Brooklyn contains many eminent veterinary surgeons, and of these I called on one of them recently and asked him to talk about the training of veterinary students. This is what he said: "In my opinion, surgeons, both human and animal, are born, not made. A man must be peculiarly fitted for the profession which in many particulars requires training and study as hard as he who would graduate as M. D. In many particulars the class of study and the requirements are the same. One to be eligible must be 21 years old, and prior to entering a veterinary college he must have read with a reputable surgeon for three years. And just here let me state that there are no legally licensed veterinary colleges in America. In 1853 a law was passed providing that no college, unless it possessed the sum of $50,000 to be used in the purchase of an anatomical museum, should receive a charter, by the way, was not in any manner connected with the college, and the name, which was which was organized in 1884, was not a legal institution."

"What are the first lessons taught?" I asked. "The beginner must commence by studying anatomy and physiology. He then takes up pathology and step by step acquires that knowledge which is used in after life. Out of the 200,000 physicians or more in the United States, there is not one in 1,000 who has at first a love for his profession. So it is with veterinary surgeons. Young men study two or three years and, without having any previous knowledge of the animal frame, graduate and are thrust upon the world. Do they live? Yes, but it is at the expense of the public."

Talking about the treatment of dogs in these hot days, Dr. Smith says: "I don't think there is such a disease as hydrophobia. Many, of course, die from the effects of a dog bite, but death, in my opinion, is caused by lockjaw and not by hydrophobia. Dogs during hot weather should not be permitted to run in the streets. They should have plenty of water and but little meat. Meat is heating to the blood and causes apoplexy or rush of blood to the head. A bite from a dog that has the rabies is nearly always fatal. Rabies in a human being is not so common and is not so dangerous as it is in a dog. Do you remember reading of the death of Butler, the dog fancier, in this city some years ago? It was said that he died from hydrophobia, although the disease, according to medical authorities, does not develop itself within six weeks or six months. Butler showed evidences of having the rabies ten days after being bitten and after suffering terrible agony for forty-eight hours he died. His jaw was firmly set and he had every symptom of lockjaw, or paralysis of the throat. One great cause of dogs going mad is indigestion. Worms, known to the profession as leech worms, will also cause them to have the rabies. No small malice is more poisonous than the bite of a dog. A cat's bite is dangerous too, but seldom causes anything more serious than a severe swelling. - Cor. Brooklyn Eagle.

The Bacon Trade in England. At the examination of a Bradford bank, a highly interesting custom of the bacon trade was disclosed. The bank, a grocer named Mitchell, stated that he applied the brand of any dealer of bacon he sold, in order to satisfy customers who fancied a particular brand; that this was an established practice in the bacon trade; and that he had known of it being intended to deceive the public. This reminds me of a story told by that versatile traveler Mark Twain. In a German market he asked for a pound of bacon, and the waiter brought the wrong kind. Upon the mistake being pointed out to him the waiter apologized, took the bottle away, and a different kind of bacon and brought it back in triumph. But Mark Twain's waiter was at least straightforward, whereas I do not suppose that bacon dealers stamp the dealer's name on their bacon under the very eyes of their customers. The Bradford registrar thought that this singular practice ought to be made known to the public. I quite agree with him. - London Truth.

Two Lost Opportunities. I have been told that the most serious wound inflicted on the Merrimac in this action was self-inflicted, when she ran herself up on the iron-shod bulwarks of the Monitor, for the Merrimac was so low that she ran clear up on her deck, and exposed, in doing so, her wood ends beneath her plating, thus causing a serious leak. Had these iron-shod bulwarks been low clear of her, or shattered it so that she would not have sunk. Had those iron-shod bulwarks not been on the Merrimac, she would have been hauled up, and it would have been the easiest thing in the world to have jumped on board and captured her, as few men as the Merrimac, all told, or, in fact, on board the boat, all told. They did not notice it, but backed their ship off, and the light proper began - Chittag.

Why a Little Soup? Guests discovered years and years ago that a little soup was an excellent appetizer; so the custom of soup first began to prevail. But custom is like a little soup, so that no matter how hungry you may be, or how delicious the soup, a little is all one takes. Why should not one eat more of it if he wants to? The guest would be satisfied with the soup, and all the dinner following would be a failure to the guest and a disappointment to the hostess. There is no more reason in one guest continuing to eat until satisfied than there is in one soldier putting out his left foot when all the rest of the regiment put out their right. - Ladies' Home Journal.

Worthy of Confidence. A great many who are reluctant to visit a physician, although they know that disease is creeping into their veins, and that the root to the grave, would do so if they felt that their confessions would be held in strict and honorable confidence. To such the reputation of Dr. Albert, the head of the great Albert Medical Institute at Cleveland, is the best guarantee. This gentleman has been consulted in thousands of delicate cases and no one can say that the cure he reposed in him has ever been abused. He will visit our city on Sunday and Monday, September 4 and 5, when he will be at a distance on a sunny, quiet summer day is largely due to social impurities. - New York Sun.
