The stories told in "The Professor" of Mr. Brookfield's scathing remarks are endless. On one occasion a young actor who had lately made a bit of a hit in a small part was regaling a few friends at great length upon the "splendid notices" he had received and the various merits of his performance. At last Brookfield quietly remarked: "But, my dear sir, you are not really at all good in the part. I have never seen you do anything well, but in this particular you are simply naughty."

"Indeed!" said the young man, bristling up. "I suppose so distinguished a critic as yourself would deny my being an actor at all!"

"I certainly should," said Mr. Brookfield.

"Then what would you call me?" asked the young man, a little recklessly.

"Well," said Brookfield, with a sweet smile, "I think I should describe you as a pardonable error."—Fall Mail Gazette.

STORY OF A LOST WILL

By Euretta D. Metcalf.

"But, Maudie, this thing is worthless!" I said again, shrinking from the dread horror confronting us in the legal document on my desk. "I drew up a later will, in which your father bequeaths the bulk of his estate to you, leaving only a comfortable income to your brother. This was drawn by my father years ago, when you and Charlie and I were children. I tell you, sweetheart, there is another."

"Where?" she asked despairingly. "Aunt and I have examined every inch of the house, every scrap of writing since you told us, but we find nothing. Worse than the dependence on my poor, weak brother is the thought that he—oh, Maudie, if he has done what we fear, how can I bear the shame?"

I drew the girl's troubled face to my shoulder with a wave of solicitation for my share in the dilemma, the conscientious, the methodical, who lived by the clock, had for once been careless in business. "Darling, the fault is mine," I declared, "occasionally assuming all blame rather than give her further cause to grieve over a misapprehension. 'Let me go over the account exactly as it happened, and perhaps together we can see a ray of light where my eyes alone are blind. Three weeks ago to-day I was preparing to leave my office, and had already put a number of papers in my bag—pointing to the alligator grip my fiancé was familiar with—you know it is my custom to stop at the safety deposit vault on my way home and personally look up in my private vault all valuable documents accumulated through the day."

"I know," she answered, a shade of annoyance darkening her wood-violet eyes. "It has always seemed strange to me that you do not have a private safe in your office."

"I inherited the custom with the business," I laughed, ignoring her unworded asperity. "As I was closing my desk your father came in apparently in the best of health and asked me, much to my surprise, to draw up a new will."

"There is nothing like being prepared," he said, in explanation. "Since my son has developed a passion for gambling he is not a fit guardian for my daughter's share of the estate. If I should die suddenly the old will would leave Maudie practically dependent on her brother's charity. Ah, he promised so well, but now she is my tower of strength!"

"I immediately drew up a will at his dictation, which, as I told you, named you executrix, and your father signed it in the presence of Darby, the artist in the next suite, and the janitor."

"Why cannot they testify?" she asked quickly, her sad eyes brightening a trifle.

"Because the fates are cruel to us, sweetheart. That very night the janitor dropped dead in an apoplectic fit and Darby has disappeared. I have hunted him like a sleuth since this came up," enlarging the offending will with my ruler.

"After our business was concluded," I went on, "your father, Darby and I sat talking on different subjects, which by degrees led up to psychic phenomena. Your father cited numerous cases investigated by the Psychical Society which he declared were sufficient proof that death does not destroy communication between the material and spiritual worlds. He confidently asserted that science is rapidly reaching a point where thought waves would become telepathic wires carrying messages between finite and infinite minds. The discussion was long and heated, and in conclusion he said, turning to me: 'There are some so blind as those who will not see. You refuse to voluntarily make or witness any experiments in telepathy to satisfy yourself, but the probabilities are strong that I will go first, my boy. If I do, expect me to communicate with you in a manner so weird and startling as to forever convince you I am right.' Then, laughing, he and Darby went out together and I never saw him again."

"Although I do not remember placing the new will in my bag, I probably did so the moment it was signed. One so methodical as I would naturally do so. Your father's earnestness was so impressive, and his uncanny stories took such a firm hold on me, I was yet under their influence when next day a messenger informed me your father had died suddenly from heart failure. My first thought after you (pressing her hand) was of my professional duties as his lawyer. I immediately went after the will. It was not in the safety box, neither was it in the bag, nor on my desk, nor in the waste-paper basket, standing full as I had left it the day before. No one had been in my office, for the only person who might have entered, the janitor, was dead. From the office to the vault the bag was unopened; was never out of my hands. I have the only key to the strong box. No one but the witnesses knew the will had been made, and Darby accompanied your father when he left my office. It was not in your father's possession, or it would have been found, either upon his person or among his papers. Could any one—who was with him when—when—"

"It happened Maudie?"

"Poor, little girl! She went white as her knees quaked nodding on my desk."

"He was with my brother in the library where he kept his business papers. To follow that fingerpost is to travel a yet darker road, Maudie. Charlie was alone with him some time before he mentioned help. Don't probe any further!"

"Even I turned sick at the suggestion. The new will practically disinherited the son. He knew of the long-standing document that named him his father's heir. He was the only person benefited by the disappearance, and disinherited had dulled his sense of honor. The pain in my fiancée's eyes moved me to speak out the thoughts that had harassed me since I discovered the all-important document missing."

"Maudie, no need must be rejected as too slender to lean upon now. Perhaps your brother and I are both innocent, both truthful. I am not superstitious, you know, but after our last world argument your father's will, suddenly, mysteriously missing, brought with it an uncanny thought. I have been unable to shake off with reason: Remember the promise made by the conscientious business man, whose word was equal to a bond, that he would communicate with me from the spirit world."

"Perhaps he has," I continued in a hushed voice. "Perhaps this is the promised proof." I paused, again to weigh my words carefully. "If it is, if he will direct my grief, my darling, by directing us to our returning the paper that will vindicate your brother of attempted fraud, I will—"

She interrupted my declaration of a new faith eagerly. "It is possible, Maudie," she said. "Mind reckon no distance. If we both earnestly pray, our united concentration will put us in communication with my father, my real father, who is not buried under Oakwood leaves, but living in his next higher sphere, for prayer, you know, is the precipitation of individual will into the mysteries that surround the Godhead."

I gaped with astonishment, for my fiancé had never before expressed her concurrence with her father's peculiar beliefs, but so strong was her suggestion that under its reflection I lived the night on a mental altitude and then understood, as if by magic, the waves of ether high above the material plane. I went down to my office next morning prepared for anything, and of course found nothing new bearing on the case. My unwonted mental tension broke, and it was sure to, under the day's cares, and left me irritable, disinclined to work. About 11 o'clock I closed my desk and went out, carefully locking the door behind me. When I returned, I found the door unlocked, floating as it were on waves of ether high above the material plane.
