WOMEN AS FARMERS

Success of Some Who Have Taken Up Claims in the Northwest

In the great Canadian Northwest, where the erstwhile wilderness is waving with golden grain and towns are springing up over night, not a few women have gone to seek their fortunes alone. A homestead grant of 160 acres is free, and any "head of a family," man or woman, may secure it upon application to the Canadian government. Usually, of course, the applicant is a man, but occasionally a woman essays to make her fortune on the prairies without masculine aid.

Miss Marie Gilroy of Saskatchewan is one of the most famous woman settlers of the west. She put her last shilling into a prairie farm and spent seven years in a hand-to-hand tussle with fortune, sitting on her own binder, cutting her own grain, handling the plow in the furrow and doing stable duty. In 1906 her holding excited the admiration of a young Englishman, and Miss Gilroy was induced to hand over lock, stock and barrel to him for the round sum of $15,000. Today Miss Gilroy is touring Europe on the proceeds of her original $2,000.

Mrs. McGivray, who came to the Canadian west twenty years ago with six small children, is another prominent woman farmer of Saskatchewan. Beginning almost penniless, her 160 acres of homestead have now grown to an 800-acre estate, and her children are settled around her in comfort and affluence.

Salome Wertman came with her husband and little family from Russia, and soon she, too, was a widow. She still kept on "trying to earn bread," as she says, and sixteen years after her absolute penniless start she stands as one of the successful land owners of Saskatchewan.

Mrs. Ferris is known as the "woman farmer" of the Portage Plains. Left with a family of young children, she has managed her farm most successfully since the death of her husband. She comes from Belfast, Ireland, and when she arrived in Western Canada with her husband thirty-two years ago they had no capital at all. She now has an estate of 760 acres, and her two sons are settled near at hand, each the owner of a half section of land—about 500 acres.

Mrs. Grant has a beautiful farm on the banks of the Canadian Killarney, in Southern Manitoba. Three years ago she went there from Scotland with her son, a young man just out of college, and her daughter. A year ago, just as they were preparing for spring seeding, the son was stricken down with appendicitis and in twenty-four hours was dead. Filled with hatred for the place, she decided to leave it, but the morning after her son's funeral, when she was packing up, her daughter called to her, "Mother, come here, quick!" She looked and saw that men, teams and plows, quietly and without a word of explanation, were beginning work on the farm. The neighbors had decided to put in the season's crop for the two bereaved women. They actually plowed, harrowed, seeded and reaped the entire crop. After that Mrs. Grant talked no more of going "home." Her farm by the shores of the Canadian Killarney was home to her.

Many women teachers, too, are found on the Canadian prairies, but they never remain long in the schools, though they do not leave the prairies.—New York Tribune.

Her Name

"He's got the funniest name yet for his wife."

"What is it?"

"He calls her 'Opportunity.'"

"Why in the world does he call her that?"

"Because she is a knocker."—Houston Post.

Reflections of a Bachelor

One comfort about being in jail must be that the few automobiles cannot try to run over you.

A woman would rather be able to talk of her safe deposit vault than have anything to put in it.

If a girl had the whooping cough and you told her how musical her voice was when she did it she'd believe you.—New York Press.
