MAJORS ASSAILANT ELUDES THE POLICE

WOUNDED MAN TELLS STORY CORROBORATING THAT OF HIS WIFE.

MOTIVE STILL A MYSTERY

Authorities Are Without a Definite Clue, But Are Working Assiduously on the Case.

New Orleans, La.—The remarkable ease with which a would-be murderer may accomplish his purpose and then make his escape has been illustrated in the shooting and wounding of Major Harold S. Hetrick, West Point graduate, in charge of the government river engineers at New Orleans, at his residence, 2026 Robert street.

Major Hetrick, with two terrible wounds in his head—the vitality he is displaying astounding his physicians—in faint words and almost incoherent notes, from his cot in Charity Hospital, told practically the same story of the shooting as that related by his wife and her mother, Mrs. Jennie Grey.

Police Superintendent Mooney has spent nearly all of his time in an effort to solve New Orleans' latest tragedy.

The police are looking for the man who, revolver in hand, forced his way past Mrs. Grey, after ringing the front doorbell of the Hetrick residence, and attacked Major Hetrick, who rushed to the front of the house upon hearing his mother-in-law's screams.

There is a tradition among graduates of the United States Military Academy that West Pointers have no regard for personal safety. Major Hetrick lived up to this tradition. As he rushed into the reception hall he saw a man with a revolver in his hand. The intruder fired at him and wounded the major in the head.

The officer, despite his wound, leaped forward. The intruder fired again, and the second time the major was wounded in the head. This never stopped him.

Courageous and determined, he closed in on the man with the smoking weapon and grappled with him. He forced him down—the intruder could not shoot, but his murderous instinct made him turn his pistol to a club, and with the butt of it he hammered upon Major Hetrick's head until the officer sank into unconsciousness upon the floor.

But the soldier never quit fighting for the gun, and apparently in a moment of flashing consciousness, finally wrested it from his assailant, for, when the ambulance surgeons lifted the major from the floor of the reception hall to remove him to the hospital, the intruder's pistol, a nickel-plated one, called by the police "a silver pistol," was lying under the major's body.
