

Josephine, the Star of Napoleon.

BY REV. J. S. GIBBETT.

The fascinations of Josephine's personal address drew multitudes of friends around her, and her society was ever courted. As time softened the pangs of her past sorrows, she sought more and more in the circles of that metropolis ever devoted to gaiety.

"It is very possible," he replied. "The military are only automata, to which the government gives such motions as it pleases. They have no duty but to obey. Besides, I wish to teach the Parisians a little lesson. This is my seal which I have set upon France!"

"This he said in such quiet, calm, imperturbable tones, so expressive of his perfect confidence in himself, and his indifference to the opinions of others, that Josephine was quite enraptured, and replied in tones which indicated her displeasure.

"These light skirmishes," the young general replied, "are but first courtesies of my glory."

"If you are to acquire glory at such a price," Josephine replied, "I would rather count you among the victims."

Such was the first interview between Josephine and Napoleon. It was merely a casual meeting at an evening party, between a widow, graceful and beautiful, and a young man of boundless ambition. Napoleon being now in command of the troops in Paris, executed the duty of the police.

The next day Eugene, who was then a boy twelve years of age, of exceedingly prepossessing appearance, presented himself before Napoleon, and implored the return of the sword which had belonged to his father. Napoleon was greatly interested in the frankness and fervor of emotion manifested by the lad, and immediately complied with his request. Josephine called upon him the next day, to thank him for his kindness to her son.

Josephine, a young widow with beauty, grace, intelligence and property, was sure to attract attention, and to meet with admirers who would seek her hand.

A new insurrection by the populace of Paris was at this time planned against the Convention. The exasperated people were again to march upon the Tuilleries. The members were in extreme consternation. The mob could bring tens of thousands against them, well armed with muskets and heavy artillery.

There were but five hundred regular troops, with which to resist the onset. Menou, the officer in command, acknowledged his inability to meet the crisis, and surrendered his power to Barras. He immediately, as by a sudden thought, exclaimed, "I know the man who can defend us. It is a little Corsican who dares do anything, and is perfectly reckless of consequences."

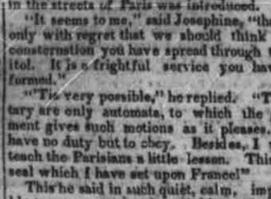

The little Corsican Napoleon Bonaparte, the day-star of whose fame was just beginning to rise over the smouldering ruins of Tolon, was presented to the Convention. His fragile form was almost feminine in its proportions, but an eagle eye calmly reposed in his pallid and emaciated countenance. He had been severely sick, and the Convention looked with amazement upon this feeble youth, as the one presented to rescue them from their peril.

The President looked upon him doubtfully and said, "Are you willing to undertake our defence?" "Yes!" was the calm, laconic reply. "But are you aware of the magnitude of the undertaking?" "I am in the habit of accomplishing every thing I undertake," was the imperturbable response.

From that moment his authority was established. Every member of the Convention felt the mysterious fascination of his master mind. Barras surrendered the whole command into his hands. He instantly called in all the national forces which were around Paris, and disposed fifty pieces of artillery under the command of Marat, so as to rake all the avenues to the Convention. His calm and almost superhuman energy sought no repose that night. The delay of a few moments would have placed this very park of artillery which secured his victory, in the hands of the insurgents. When the morning dawned, the Tuilleries, as if by magic, had assumed the aspect of a fortified camp. The little Corsican was calmly awaiting the onset, as secure of triumph as if the victory was already achieved.
