GREATER WENATCHEE PRO-JECT WOULD COST $7,137,738.

The cost of constructing the Greater Wenatchee irrigation ditch, to water 42,800 acres, is estimated by the state department of Conservation and Development to cost a total of $7,137,738, or $166.77 per acre. This acreage, we understand, would all be in Chelan county. If the project were enlarged and carried on to water Quincy lands the cost would be greater.

The committee at Wenatchee in charge of the survey and estimates is said to feel that the project is entirely feasible, that it can be financed and steps should be taken to form a district and get work started on the ditch.

The completion of the project would mean a monster increase in property valuations in this county. Lands under the ditch now worthless excepting that they may be pastured a few weeks, would become productive and this would mean thousands more people could find homes here—and homes on farms are what is needed in place of so many people depending upon wage-earnings. The Echo is for the development of those new homes in this county, and hopes to see thousands of those people now working for others settled on their
