William D. Haywood was the first to recover, and he immediately went to each member of the jury, taking their hands in his, shook each feelingly and thanked each personally for granting him his freedom.

Tears streamed down his cheeks, his frame shook with emotion. Turning to Judge Wood, Haywood expressed his thanks to the judge, then hurried to a nearby telephone and rang up his mother, Mrs. Verne, and told her the glad news, and who notified the rest of the family.

Haywood then left the court room, sprung into a carriage waiting at the door, and was driven to the hospital, where his mother was confined, having been suddenly stricken Saturday night. The presence of her son had a splendid effect on her, and she rallied wonderfully.

Jumping into a waiting carriage, Haywood drove home, where he was met by getting there he fell into his wife's arms and with his children about him dictated the following statement:

"I thank my friends who have been so good to me. I simply repeat the statement I made when arrested, that a fair trial and an impartial jury would prove my innocence.
