Quimet Victory Is Described in "Tensest Minute"

By Hugh S. Fullerton

(Third installment Hugh Fullerton's "Five Tensest Minutes in Sport.") MERICA seemed overthrown, beaten. The greatest golfers of the United States had fallen before the magnificent play of Vardon and Ray, the English professionals, and on the afternoon of September 19, 1913, hope seemed dead. Vardon and Ray had swept the field on the final 18 holes of the greatest tournament known in America and had finished their play, tied with their scores 304 strokes each.

Gathered around the 18th green, in front of the clubhouse lawn at Brookline, Mass., were 5,000 rather downcast followers of the game, lamenting politely the overthrow of their favorites by the two wonderful English golfers, who stood already receiving the congratulations of friends. In the clubhouse the wagering was lively as to whether Vardon or Ray would win the play-off of their tie on the following day.

A counting of scores showed that, unless one of the half-dozen golfers who were on their fourth 18-hole round performed a miracle, Vardon's and Ray's 304 total could not be eclipsed. Suddenly one came running from far across the greens, bearing tidings. A buzz of excitement and renewed hope ran through the crowd. The Englishmen listened tolerantly.

The word was that Francis Oulmet, a high school boy of Brookline, only 19 years old, was coming homeward over the last nine holes, playing the most astounding golf of the tourney. A three, a two, a four, he was cutting down his score by beating par and playing marvelously. The word came from the 15th tee that Oulmet had reached there with a total score of 290, and that if he could make the last four holes in one he would win the play-off of their tie on the following day.

Behind Oulmet a swarm of friends marched over the sodden links, silent, yet palpitating with excitement. The boy faced the 370-yard 15th green, a drive, a perfect approach, a moment of tense anxiety and he holed a putt and took the hole in three. The news from that green stirred the crowd again. Men and women poured from the clubhouse and lawn to bank around the final green. The 16th is short, 125 yards, but ticklish, and Oulmet, driving the edge of the green, rolled his approach dead and holed in three. The 17th is 350 yards. He drove perfectly, chipped an approach, shot onto the green, took two perfect putts—and the crowd at the clubhouse lawn surged forward.

Oulmet, America's last hope, was 410 yards away, with chance to equal the record of the two greatest of English golfers—he a school-boy and an amateur. As he came leading the line of the gallery, Oulmet exchanged a laughing ally with his caddy, and, choosing his iron, he snipped the head of a dandelion as he walked. He chipped the ball true and high, clearing the pit and guardian mound and lay 35 feet from the cup.

Never in golfing history has such a situation arisen. The open championship depended upon the next shot. If Oulmet could make that putt, he was king of the world's golfers, conqueror of the greatest the world could send. Yet, smiling, he turned and nodded to a little woman, his mother, who was following him all over the course. She smiled back.

The boy, still smiling, dried his hands, took his putter, and, without the quiver of a muscle, studied the slight slope of the green and rolled a wondrous putt toward the hole. As the ball rolled the crowd held its breath. It rolled straight, true, swerved a little, just touched the rim of the cup and rolled three feet beyond. An instant later Oulmet rolled down the putt and tied Vardon and Ray.

The ethics of golfing ceased. The crowd swarmed upon the smiling schoolboy, and in the first rank came Vardon and Ray to wring his hand. "Great golf!" said Vardon. And the next day the schoolboy, still smiling, played off the tie and defeated the great English veterans. (Fourth "Tensest Minute" Tomorrow.)

The articles of agreement give O'Leary power to choose the third man in the ring, and Johnny approached Hulen. Hulen is well acquainted with both fighters, and for this reason turned the offer down.

Leo Strait Gets Bounced in East; Nill Plays Again

Leo Strait, one of the fly-chasing brigade of the 1913 Seattle team, has received the blue envelope from the Jersey City club in the International league and is now playing for Troy in the New York state circuit. Leo batted the ball lopsided earlier in the season, and looked so good Muggsy McGraw got interested and wanted to buy him. The price was too high, though, for Muggsy's wallet.

George Nill, also a Giant in 1913, is playing second base for Toronto in the International. In a recent paper from that city, the box scores for a double-header had George down for three hits, one a two-base slam. Nill couldn't hit the ground with his bat here.

SIR TOM YACHT RACE WINNER

While Freddie Welsh and Willie Ritchie were musing up the ring in Lun, local yachting enthusiasts assembled at the Seattle Yacht clubhouse at West Seattle yesterday afternoon, munched fight bulletins and watched three light yachts—Sir Tom, Spray and Defender—fight it out for honors in the first elimination round, to decide Seattle's entrant in the Lipton cup races on the Sound.

Sir Tom, modeled and manned by Ted Geary, skipped away from its rivals, and blew over the finishing line 6 minutes and 10 seconds ahead of the Defender, and 11 minutes and 18 seconds in the lead of the Spray.
