THE MAN WHO DARED

John Hunt, San Francisco traveling man, became acquainted with Anna Sterling on the Oakland ferry boat when it hits the side of the slip and throws her violently against him. They spend the next few weeks together, but Anna is infatuated by both the physical and mental charms of the girl. His curiosity is aroused by the fact that she is a woman who knows what she is doing. She means to live. Her friendship grows during those weeks, but Anna will shed no light on how she lives.

When, after their first kiss as lovers, she tells him, "I have a husband and a woman—you know what I mean; those who have fallen in the mire?" John tells her he cannot feel so superior to them that he can see only their ugliness. The courtship continues.

Later Hunt sees Anna on the street with a man in a disreputable part of the city, and following, sees them enter a notorious rooming house. He is angry, but he has recently a notorious habit of the "line." His world tottering, he turns to Oliver Harding, attorney, his friend. It develops Harding has known Anna for years, and loves her—hopelessly. Harding advises Hunt to marry Anna, and speaks reverently of her as a true woman at heart. Hunt battles with himself for three weeks, and finally decides to marry her. Anna, not knowing Hunt knew her past, says, "You don't know God, how can I tell you?"

BY JOHN HUNT CHAPTER XI
If it was a solemn moment for me, asking Anna to be my wife—it was a tragic one for her.

All the ghouliah pipers who had fiddled for her transgressions demanded their pay on the instant. And she paid them—with remorseful agony, self-abasement, and the surrender of her greatest dream at the moment when it had grown dearest.

We walked on down Van Ness avenue, in the gathering dusk, aimlessly, with few words. By the white, drab face of Anna and the anguish in her eyes, I knew that the hour of her confession had come; that she was gathering strength for the terrible ordeal.

On the old gray stone wall near Fort Point we sat down. Far out beyond the Gate the revolving beacon flashed with monotonous regularity, the answering gleams from the Alcatraz light, while at our feet, like the pulse of eternity, the sea crawled in and out among the rocks.

"I've got to tell you something," began Anna, a deep weariness in her voice—"something that will change everything between us. I should have done it before, and I did try, but I couldn't."

She had grasped my thumb in the fingers of one hand, holding tight with the other she beat upon the stone wall.

"I am—I have been—a bad woman," she blurted out with a shudder. "I've gone down to the very bottom, John. I'm not the kind of girl you think I am. I have lived—I brought it out with a piteous effort—up on Alcatraz."

I did not interrupt. This was her battle. There was little I could do to help.

"I shouldn't have let you care so much. And I should have quit before I learned to care so much; so terribly much, my dear."

"You were a new kind of man to me, John. I don't know what I was that morning on the boat. I thought anyone could read what I was."

"He's just pretending not to know," I said to myself when you were so gentle and thoughtful—when you wouldn't kiss me that night. He just wants to be nice to me, I said. It had been so long since I had been respectable that I wanted to see if I had forgotten how. So I didn't say anything, and it was very nice, your treating me like other girls."

"Then when you asked to see me again and again, I began to doubt and to wonder whether, after all, you did know what kind of girl I was. I wanted to tell you then, but the growing friendship was too sweet, your clean attentions robbed me of the power. So I drifted along."

"Almost right away I began to care, in a way I had thought impossible; as I had never cared for any man. Anna Sterling, adventures, really loving a man with all her heart. I laughed. And then I cried."

"I had kept one clean spot in my heart, thru it all, and you reached it."

Her fingers tightened on my thumb, and for a time she was silent. The vigilant gleam of the seaward light illumined her pallid features with monotonous regularity. A vessel, green lights showing, slipped out on the northward passage.

"I quit the life on Alcatraz six weeks ago; when I told you I was on my vacation," she resumed, with patient deliberateness. "I never felt that it was the real me who lived up there in that vile den. But I had gone into it so gradually that there was no great shock, and then I was alone, soiled, an outcast—and I had to earn my living."

"And now you have asked me to marry you. I wish I had told you before. Then, of course, you wouldn't have asked me. But you would at least have respected me a little for my honesty, wouldn't you? You who think so much of honesty and integrity."

I couldn't withhold it any longer—my own avowal. Anna seemed so broken, so hopeless, so penitent in her debasement. A profound pity overwhelmed me.

"Why, Anna," I said, "I have known it for a long time. I found it out by accident—what you hadn't courage to tell me. Don't think I was prying into your life. It was not premeditated. I saw you on the Coast one evening—with that man. I learned about Alcatraz that night."

She leaped toward me in amazement. For a moment she seemed not to comprehend.

"You mean," she gasped, "that you knew and asked me to marry you anyway? Do you mean that, John?"

"Yes," I replied, comforting her, and strangely at peace despite the harrowing character of her recital, with all its import. "I can't demand more of you, Anna, than you have a right to demand of me. And my life has not been without blessing either, as I would have wished it now that I am offering it to you with my love."

"Then this is not the end?" she asked, thru her tears.

"No," I answered, "this is the beginning, Anna."

ERICKSON RAPS STATE CONTROL; TELLS REMEDY

ATLANTA, June 1.—Added to the hundreds of thousands who signed petitions asking for the commutation of Leo Frank's death sentence to life imprisonment, a letter was read yesterday to the prison board from the late Judge L. S. Roan, who presided over the Frank trial, and who later expressed his doubt as to Frank's guilt, notwithstanding the jury's verdict.

The letter was dated December 1914, and was addressed to Frank's counsel. Judge Roan died in March. The letter, in part, was as follows:

"After considering your communication asking that I recommend clemency in the punishment of Leo M. Frank, I wish to say that at the proper time I shall ask the prison commission to recommend and the governor to commute Frank's sentence to life imprisonment."

After many months of continued deliberation I am still uncertain of Frank's guilt.

"This state of uncertainty is largely due to the character of the negro Conley's testimony, by which the verdict was evidently reached."

The execution of any person whose guilt has not been satisfactorily proven to the constituted authorities is too horrible to contemplate."

Councilman Oliver T. Erickson, principal speaker at the Referendum meeting of the Democratic club, Good Eats cafeteria, Saturday, in a brief address remarkable for its sledge-hammer directness, urged every friend of popular sovereignty, home rule, and progress in collective undertakings to aid in getting referendum petitions signed "beyond the dreams of sculdgeery."

Erickson assailed the Renick law, the fake budget bill, and the certificate of necessity fraud, and demanded that the great city of Seattle be not turned over to "carpet-bagger" rule of politicians appointed from Mukilteo.

"Talk about state commissions," said Erickson, "why, the state board of 'Incompetency' smoking cigarettes in the city hall, with five men drawing $5 per man per day, cost the King county taxpayers $7,200 last year. There are 50 men in the city hall who are better accountants."

This year the state is going to put seven men checking the light and water departments, an absolute waste of public funds that is of no value to the state nor to the county."

ERICKSON TO TALK
Councilman Erickson will address the Referendum league luncheon at the Good Eats cafeteria Wednesday morning. But a few days now remain for the referendum campaign, and Erickson, who is president of the league, will outline the progress made. Mrs. Emily Peters will preside.

FREE CONCERT
Another free concert will be given Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the auditorium, Stuart building. Pupils of a dancing academy will also contribute to the program arranged by the Manufacturers' association.

HE SURE DID RUN
In an attempt to capture William Barth, alleged to have stolen an auto, Detectives Majewski and Bianchi Tuesday morning fired several shots at him while chasing him for several blocks. He escaped. The detectives have been after Barth for several days, and located him Tuesday at a residence at 20th and John st. As they approached the place by the rear way, Barth jumped out of a window and took to his heels.
