THE CONFESSIONS OF A WIFE

BURY YOUR GRIEF "DECENTLY AND IN ORDER" AS YOU DO YOUR DEAD

(Copyrighted by the Newspaper Syndicate Association)

"But Mary, dear, you could not be so philosophical about it all if you did not work." Mary and I were still talking of our griefs in the loss of our babies.

"I have always thought you could write, Margie."

"Before I had both Pat Sullivan and Mr. Hatton urged me to give them the contents of my little book for publication, but I felt I could not do it, besides, I do not believe I could possibly be so truthful in my estimations of myself and others if I knew that some one else was going to read them."

"Can't you take some of them out and make a story of it?" "I don't know, Mary. Some way, I feel that all the 'confessions' that have been written from Rousseau to Mary McLane have been made with the express intention of impressing the reader they were not truths, but things that the writers wanted the readers to think were truths."

"My little book, Mary, contains my inmost heart's desires, my most secret longings, things that I hardly own to myself. I have written down just exactly what I think of all of you and how I regard life."

"Mercy. That would certainly make interesting reading. Who is the hero and who is the villain of your story? I suppose, of course, the hero is Dick."

"Yes, dear, Dick is the hero and the villain also, just as all of us are always both virtuous and vile. Mary, I don't believe that any one in the world, that is, any normal person, is ever perfectly virtuous."

"The only thing that women so often mistake virtues for virtue. We want our husbands to be blameless, forgetting that means superhuman—indeed, I might say, inhuman."

"Virtue, to my mind, has always stood for the good that is in us, irrespective of the evil that might lie sleeping there also."

"You are perfectly right, Margie. We think we want a virtuous man for a husband and then when we get an oyster for ours—one who never by any possibility can be found prowling around the oyster bed fighting other gentlemen oysters and making love to lady oysters—we grow very tired of his insinuity and wish that he would do something if even it was only to wash the shell and let the salt water drown him."

"I laughed as I said: 'Mary, you are mixing your metaphors. You can't drown an oyster in salt water. My dear, salt water is his native heath. And then I stopped short. Was that I who was laughing? It did not sound real, for it was the first time I had laughed since my baby had come from and gone out into the nowhere. I caught my breath sharply and Mary looked up quickly."

"Yes, yes, dear, I know it seems almost a sacrilege to laugh or even smile when one has passed through suffering as terrible as ours, but, Margie, here lies the whole story: WE HAVE PASSED THRU IT. It is over; the wound has been made and now you must do every thing possible to heal it. In some of us it probably takes longer than in others, and some of us will bear a scar that will ache and hurt us till our dying day—however, there is one thing we must remember: Wounds that will heal, consequently, our wounds must be either healed or in the process of healing."

"But, Mary, I don't want to forget my baby."

"You need not, Margie, but I know you now forgive me, dear, for I know you will know that I fought the same battle with myself that you are fighting now, when I say that you must not impose its memory on every one else—people who have other aims, desires, loves, grieves and pleasures. Margie, there is no place in this world for grief, because there is nothing in this world so unavailing as grief. You must bury it as you do your dead—decently and in order."

CYNTHIA GREY'S LETTERS AND ANSWERS

Dear Cynthia Grey: I am a working girl alone in this city. I make on an average $4 a week in a factory, and am broke most of the time, but manage somehow. I have no friends yet, as I have been working only a few weeks and am a stranger here. I see the girls at the factory, and that is all. When I get to my room I am dead tired usually, but it is impossible to stay in and just sit still. Sometimes I go to the library, but I can't do that all the time. I have gone to Dreamland and the Hippodrome a few times and watched, but I don't like to dance when I don't know any one. There is a city school to go to evenings that I know of, and everything one would like to go to takes care and money and friends.

Yes, I know I ought to do housework—but did you ever try it? Honestly, Cynthia Grey, I'd rather starve or go to jail. And on $4 a week I suppose that is what will eventually happen. But, then, who cares?

JUST A GIRL.
A—Dear little girl, I know a number of people who care, and who would be glad to welcome a good girl into their home and make her spare moments brighter if they only knew how to get in touch with her. A city is a lonely place for a strange girl, especially one who must depend upon a meager salary and can afford no spending money. Under such circumstances, the most optimistic girl in the world would get blue at times, but even tho she seems to you that no one in the world cares, for your own sake you must keep on caring. Keep a definite purpose in mind—don't drift; don't back-step; push steadily forward, and you are bound to win.

ELECTRO PAINLESS DENTISTS

1st and Pike, Opp. Public Market
Laboring People's Dentists.

Dear Miss Grey: I have just finished reading your comment on a broken-hearted mother's letter and am surprised to hear you say you are inclined to believe the lax system of marriage is responsible for the jails, asylums and reformatories being filled.

Don't you know that under favorable conditions people grow up notwithstanding? We can't have favorable conditions till we get economic industrial freedom. When conditions are such that we can all get the full product of our labor—then we can have normal people; then every one will have to do something useful for a living. We won't any of us have to overdo our strength, and those who now do nothing will have to work enough to make them normal or temperate in habits.

As it is, some indulge in drink because they are physically exhausted. Some are interperate because they don't work enough to make them normal. Poverty breeds undesirable; excess wealth breeds undesirable; while if we were all put on an equal basis and given an equal chance under a sane system, instead of a system founded on rent, interest and profit, there would soon be no work for jails, asylums and reformatories, and this would solve the problem of prostitution, that so many investigations have failed to solve, for normal people, under normal conditions, live normal lives.
