THE GODDESS

INTRODUCING

EARLE WILLIAMS as . . . Tommy Barclay
ANITA STEWART as . . . The Goddess
Written by GOUVERNEUR MORRIS
One of the Most Notable Figures in American Literature

Read the Story Here; See It on Screen at the Alhambra

The three richest men in America, fearing a popular revolution, and wishing to found an aristocracy of wealth, employ Professor Stilliter, a famous psychologist, to kidnap a beautiful girl, the product of eugenic marriage.

The child grows to womanhood in a cavern in the Adirondacks, where she is fed by "angels" that the cavern is "heaven," and that it is her destiny to return to earth and reform the world, teaching the people obedience and contentment.

As she is leaving the wilderness to begin her work she is rescued from Stilliter by Tommy Barclay, adopted son of the chief of the money triumvirate, who in his turn loses her to Stilliter.

Her advent in New York creates a profound sensation. The poor believe her to be "the angel." After various adventures—among them being sold by a professor to a white-slaver for $1,000—she finds shelter in the tenement home of the Douglases, in the slums. She preaches her doctrine to rich and poor alike.

She is made much of by the "smart set" of New York, but denounces the metropolitan for Blumens, where a coal miners' strike is in progress. She is followed by Tommy, who, disheartened by his adopted father, joins the cause of labor.

Celestia visits the stockade where the strike-breakers are entrenched, and persuades the sentries it is wrong to shoot strikers, which excites the wrath of Kehr, the coal baron.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(Copyright, 1915, by The Star Co.)

Celestia raised her voice. "You! without there! Open the door!"

A stern voice answered her: "Orders are to keep the door locked and shoot anybody who tries to leave the house."

"That doesn't apply to me." "It applies to you, and to the other prisoner."

"Come round to the window. We can talk better there." "Orders are not to talk with the prisoners or to look at them, unless they try to come out. Then the orders are to shoot at sight."

"Yes, but just come to the window a moment. I don't think you understand." There was no answer. She turned swiftly to Tommy:

"What does it mean?" "This, I think," said Tommy: "Kehr wants the stockade attacked. He is afraid I will prevent the attack, and that you will prevent the defense. So he's had us both up."

Gunsdorf and a committee of strikers are with him now. They will make certain unreasonable demands. He will refuse. When they return to the town the attack will begin. And if they don't return to the town by 11 o'clock, the attack will begin."

Celestia pondered this for a few minutes. Then she said: "We'll need all our strength. Have you had breakfast?"

"I couldn't eat till I'd seen you and you'd spoken to me." "How about breakfast?" she called to the sentry.

"Orders are to supply breakfast on demand." "Can you make it breakfast for two?"

"Certainly." Ten minutes later the door was opened, a steaming tray was slid along the floor thru the opening, and the door was once more closed and locked.

Almost in silence, for they were both very hungry, Celestia and Tommy ate a hearty breakfast.

Celestia knew of the fighting temper the strikers were in, and told Tommy of Kehr's preparations for making the defense of the stockade a shambles of those who should attack it.

"But, Tommy," she said, "they wouldn't be such fools as to attack in broad day, would they?" "They are very strong numerically, and very weak in the head. Their only present it to notice in unjust ways. Their every passion seems to them an argument. If they succeed in rushing this stockade and massacring everybody in it, what earthly good will it do them? None. And they don't see it. They think they will be so frightened that it will simply curl up its toes and yield to their every demand. Gunsdorf's a wise old fellow. But he's not in this game because he loves labor, but because he loves money. Carson is a fanatic—an honest fanatic. Cranzwits is an out and out anarchist. It's a pity, because, fundamentally, theirs is the side of justice. I wish I could hear what they are saying to old man Kehr. I'm afraid it will be a soothing interview for any one."

"They came with you?" Tommy nodded. "I begged them not to come, but Gunsdorf would do it. I think—"

"What?" "I think that if there is an attack on the stockade, Gunsdorf doesn't want to be mixed up in it—technically. I think he intends to make Kehr so angry that Kehr will throw him and his companions into the lock-up, white flag and all. Gunsdorf's not returning at the given time, 11 o'clock, will be the signal for the attack; and, good Lord, how the poor fools will be slaughtered."

"If you could get to them, and tell them about Gunsdorf?" "They might not believe me, but if I could get to them I'd certainly try it."

"He has no right to lock us up," said Celestia. "I wonder how many men are guarding this house?" "It was only a matter of moments to ascertain that there were but two."

"We might get away over the roofs," Tommy suggested. "They ascended to the second floor, and found a ladder which led to a trap door in the roof. But Tommy found it impossible to open this."

They returned to the parlor and sat for a while in deep thought. Whatever Celestia's thoughts may have been they succeeded in bringing into her eyes a harsh, cold look, and when she spoke at last it was no longer in the same easy friendly voice.

"I've got an idea," she said, "but I don't like it. That woman put it into my head."

"What woman?" "You know." "Mrs. Gunsdorf?" Celestia nodded. "That man out in front," she said, "is a human being. If he heard a woman screaming for help, he would try to help her, wouldn't he?" "Celestia!"

"Oh, you mustn't be frightened," said Celestia coldly. "You will be hiding behind that door. When he rushes in to save me, you will have to seize him and keep him quiet until we can get away. But you mustn't hurt him."

"Suppose the other sentry comes too?" "He won't hear. I'll only scream—in moderation."

Tommy laughed aloud and Celestia, forgetting about the Gunsdorf woman, laughed too. "How will we keep him quiet, after we've gone?"

"You must hold him so that he has to look at me. When men look at me, they have to do what I say."

"I know that," said Tommy, "all except me." "All except you."

"I suppose," said he, "it's because I love you so."

The sentry who guarded the front of the house heard a sound of shades being drawn, and found that the room to the left of the front door had, as it were, closed its eyes. For a moment the sentry smiled cynically. Then remembering the one glimpse he had had of Celestia, and her wonderful look of candor and innocence, the smile faded from his face, and its place was taken by an expression of anxiety.

Just at that moment the door knob was turned violently this way and that, and as suddenly was still again. Then the sentry heard a voice—a woman's voice—a half choked voice, full of fear and horror that half moaned and half said: "Do-n't! Do-n't!"

Then there was a sound of a heavy body being dragged away from the door.

The sentry didn't hesitate a moment. He unlocked the door, flung it open and leaped into the hallway. He was in time to see Celestia's heels bump over the threshold of the parlor door as Tommy, half laughing and half ashamed, dragged her in from the hall.

The sentry leaped to the rescue of those heels and their beautiful owner.

The situation with which he found himself confronted in the parlor was not, however, in the least what he expected.

Against the opposite wall stood the female prisoner—laughing. The male prisoner was nowhere to be seen.

Celestia stopped laughing and made a step forward, looking the sentry squarely in the eyes. He had been warned not to look at her, but he couldn't help himself.

"I hope you are not going to shoot anybody with that gun." "No, ma'am."

"Then put it down." He did so. "Come here!"

He approached close to her. "Will you do me a favor?" "Yes, ma'am. He had to say it. "I want you to wait in this room in the most comfortable chair and not leave it for an hour. Will you do that?"

The man was completely hypnotized. He moved languidly to the easiest chair, seated himself, crossed one leg over the other and began to rock slowly backwards and forwards.

"Come, Tommy," said Celestia. They closed the parlor door after them and slipped cautiously out of the house.

The platform along the stockade was lined with Kehr's men, and the attention of these was engaged with matters outside the stockade and beyond.

"By George!" exclaimed Tommy. "They must be expecting an attack."

They ran across the open space to the main gate of the stockade, and were halted by a sentry. Celestia asked the man to open the gate. He had orders to let no one leave the stockade.

"What, no one!" He found himself looking into a pair of profound eyes. "You must open it—for me!"

He hesitated, then turned slowly, and began to fumble with the somewhat complicated fastenings of the gate. A few moments later Tommy and Celestia were in the open.

About 200 yards distant was the grove surrounded by a stone wall which Kehr had not razed with the rest of the timber. It was swarming with men.

And without a word Celestia darted toward the grove as fast as she could run, followed by Tommy.

Cries to stop reached them from the top of the stockade, but they ran on. "Shall I bring them down, sir?" "No," said Kehr. "Damn them!" He had but to make a certain signal with his arm, and the men in that grove, and Celestia and Tommy and the stone wall and the grove itself would fly heavenward in one awful disarray of dynamite; but that signal he dared not give.

"Listen to me," Celestia was crying, "and believe me. You've got to believe me. You think you are sheltered here. The whole grove is mined. One spark of electricity and you will all be blown to pieces."
