

CONFESSIONS OF A WIFE

FIND I STILL LIKE COMPLIMENTS
 "Strange," I said to Mollie, after Jim left, "that Mr. Stuart should be so enthusiastic about me. I did not think, when he talked to me the three times I have seen him, that he was one of these florid sort of men."
 "I don't think he is, dear," said Mollie, "but you see Chad brought him home one night for dinner, and I happened to speak of your accident."

 "It seemed to stir him greatly. For a moment he could hardly speak, and then he said, in rather an apologetic manner, that the idea of your being helpless was horrible to him, because he had never met a woman who seemed so much alive."

"It was then that he said you reminded him of the salvia, and he ended with the compliment I repeated to you when Jim was here."
 "Little book, I thought of the piece of carved coral lying in my jewel case, and the little prose poem entitled 'What the Gardener Told Me' that came with it, but in some way I could not tell Mollie about it."

Right here, little book, I see that it would not be possible for me to let any one publish my diary, for a great many women would not understand my feelings toward Malcolm Stuart. They would say I was in love with Stuart, and accuse me of all sorts of terrible things, the least of which would be thinking more than I should of one man while married to another.
 I will not deny to you, little book, that the thought of Malcolm Stuart always gives me a most pleasant feeling.
 He was very sweet to me when I felt I was being very much neglected by Dick. He saved my pride by letting me see that other men might think me fair, when Dick seemed almost to have forgotten that I existed.

 I believe that any woman would feel as I did were she in my position.
 His romantic way of bringing himself to my notice with the "little jade god of dreams" and the "coral salvia" was so poetical that I defy any woman with a spark of imagination not to be flattered.
 Of course I know that some very good women might be horrified at it all, but I never pretended to be one of those perfect women who could not even think of anything unconventional.

 I am just an average woman, who wants to do right, and does do right most of the time, who has common sense, who will not hurt another woman—knowingly, who likes to be complimented occasionally, and who, if she finds her husband is complimenting some other woman, will be apt to listen when some other man whispers a pretty phrase.
 I'd like to be more than human, little book, and, between you and me, I sometimes pose as being better than I am. But to you I have never lied. The Margie Waverly that you know is real, and must stand—good—bad—or indifferent.

 I don't believe I could see Malcolm Stuart again, for I am foolish enough to want to stay in his mind as a creature of fire and snow, but I do like to hear that he thinks of me occasionally. Why, even dear old Jim treats me very differently since I have become a log.
 I haven't seen Dick since he dined with me and told me never to ask him to come again. He has called me up daily at noon, and yesterday he sent me a beautiful spray of orchids. He wants to do right, poor dear, but he is only a man, after all, and who am I that I should condemn him to be tied to a log—even if, as Jim intimated, it is a rather good-looking log because of its twining, flowering vines.

 I must get to that story; I am thinking too much about myself.
