

THERE'S A REASON FOR TRADING AT Westerman's

You are always certain to get your money's worth, no matter what you get—from a pair of Sox to a Suit or Overcoat.

Chilly Weather Specials

Underwear, 2-piece garments; regular $1.25 per garment, now . . . . . $1.00

A good line of Union Label Union Suits at from . . . . . $1.50 to $3.50

Union Label 2-piece Suits from . . . . . 75c to $1.50

Mackinaws, fancy Norfolks and plain. Good values at $6.00, $6.50 and $7.50

Wet Weather Shoes—now is the time. See Westerman's Special at $4.00 pair Williams' Special Shoes at $4.50 pair

Nothing better than our Union-made Suits and Overcoats at . . . . . $15.00

L. V. Westerman

Store No. 1—2 STORES—Store No. 2
First and Main—Westlake & Pine
Note the Locations

"LUCKY" BALDWIN'S GOLD MARITAL CROSS FOR HIS DAUGHTERS?

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Oct. 20.—Have the millions of E. J. (Lucky) Baldwin become a marital cross of gold for his daughters? Aside from minor bequests, the great 40,000,000 estate of the famous mining and racing man, who died about seven years ago, went to the three girls.

The three daughters are Anita Baldwin, formerly Mrs. Anita Baldwin McLaughry; Mrs. Clara Baldwin Stocker, and Mrs. Rozella Robinson Baldwin Selby.

The vast estate lay mostly in the great Santa Anita ranch of Baldwin near Los Angeles. It was upon this ranch that Baldwin caused to be built the famous Santa Anita race course, probably the most beautiful in the world.

David F. Selby of the Selby Investment company of Oakland has just filed suit for divorce, Selby, in his application for divorce, alleges that it was acquisition of his wife's money from her father's estate that brought family dissension. He declares that from the time she received her portion Mrs. Selby manifested a dislike for domestic duties.

Selby says his wife left him for weeks at a time and traveled over the country, even going to foreign shores.

The couple separated in November of 1915, when Mrs. Selby went to Long Beach, Cal., after their four-year-old daughter had been placed in an Oakland convent. Selby asks custody of the daughter, now seven years of age.

Three years ago California found much interest in the divorce suit of Mrs. Anita Baldwin McLaughry against her husband, who was connected with the San Francisco post office. Shortly before this time she had inherited a fortune from her father's estate.

Apparently it was with the coming of money that friction between the pair developed to the breaking point. Mrs. McLaughry recently secured legal title to the name of Anita Baldwin in management of the big estate near Los Angeles.

ZEPPELIN CREW CREMATED ALIVE

Famous Woman Writer Tells Eye-Witness Story of Disaster

A BLAZING TOMB

BY MARY BOYLE O'REILLY CUFFLEY, Hertfordshire, England, Sept. 30.—(By Mail.)—"Zeps about!"

The East coast flashed the warning to Cuffley about sunset.

Thirteen of "Fritz" air monsters were reported off channel, three steering for London!

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

At 2:30 a. m. a "Flying Dutchman" gleamed above the northern heights.

Over toward (name of town censored) a gun spoke. Anti-aircraft shrapnel whished across Cuffley woods, calling every man, woman and child to duty—for Cuffley was prepared.

Blobs of light searched the sky for the raider.

Gunfire rolled and growled thru the morning air.

Silent as burglars, Cuffley called men hauled out their hand engine.

Next minute an airship cruised into a spotlight. Traveling at express speed, the Zep dived and rose, belching out tremendous clouds of smoke.

Just beneath it a fast aeroplane spiraled upward, standing on its tall to climb the sky. As it rose its droplight signaled the air guards, "Leave this job to me."

So for three minutes every sky gun was silent. Only the roar of the flyer's propellers and the clangor of the Zeppelin engines sounded over the township.

Out of the dark a second levitation lunged toward the threatened raider, but fled from the rapidly rising biplane.

One-minute machine guns on both pirates were banging at their pursuer.

Next moment the deserted Zep swung around, tipped ever so slowly, and, like a broken-backed caterpillar, crawled down the sky.

Two miles below we heard the engine rhythm go wrong. Watchers beyond Cuffley smelled a sprinkle of jettaisoned petrol. Then a gleaming spot above one gondola spread round the silver envelope, and down from the stars pitched the blazing airship, shedding its incandescent entrails as it fell.

Suddenly all London was illumined by the fiery glow—the dome of St. Paul's—the towers of Westminster—flashed up against a flame red mist.

It took 16 minutes for the dying Zep to drift to earth. It fell a blazing tomb, the bodies of a cremated crew writhing in the flames.

Mummies of men showed black among the mass of white hot wires.

A big gunner lay beside his Maxim, wrapped from neck to heel in bearskin.

The pilot crouched in the bows, a diamond ring flashing on his blackened finger.

The aircraft commander—shreds of gold braid still visible on his collar—sat at the steering wheel, both legs burned off to the knee.

All Cuffley manned a bucket line to the village ditch, but the red-hot wreckage burned like a furnace. For 20 minutes machine gun ammunition kept popping, and in the heart of the flames a big clock tick-tocked without ceasing.

Again Tomorrow Miss Cora Morris Will Tell Stories to the Children

Morning, 10 to 11
Afternoon, 2:30 to 3:30
Tea Room, 6th Floor

MISS MORRIS is a wonderful story teller, and every little boy and girl in Seattle will want to hear her tomorrow. In the morning she will tell her Indian stories, and in the afternoon stories of quaint little Dutch children and people.

—So interesting are Miss Morris' stories we wish she could stay longer, but two days were all she could allow us on her schedule.

—Two hours tomorrow. All little children are invited, and mothers may come too, if they wish.

CLEVER LITTLE SWEATER COATS FOR LITTLE CHILDREN

A VARIETY of new styles just received, including one very smart new style of brushed wool, in Oxford color. Cap, sweater and leggings, special value at . . . . . $2.50

—At the other prices, various colors and qualities are shown.

—F. P. Co., Second Floor.

SMART NEW COATS FOR LITTLE GIRLS 2 TO 6 YEARS

AT $8.50 we have just received several new styles, among which there is one particularly attractive model.

—It is of good quality velvet, in black, navy blue or brown. Full skirt, in yoke and full belt style.

—A very attractive and excellent Coat for . . . $8.50

—F. P. Co., Second Floor.

A New Shipment of BOYS' AND GIRLS' MUNSUNG UNION SUITS 50c

A NEW shipment of those remarkable values in Boys' and Girls' Munsung Union Suits. Good, serviceable cotton; high neck, long sleeves; Dutch neck, elbow sleeves; all ankle lengths; sizes 2 to 12 years. . . . . 50c

—F. P. Co., First Floor.

Good News A SHIPMENT OF LITTLE SIWASH SHOES

LITTLE Siwash shoes are great favorites with parents who are particular. They contain no tacks or metal of any kind. Nothing to injure the floors or the child's foot. They are more flexible than any other shoes, yet the soles are of good weight and the best oak leather. The lasts are designed to allow the foot to grow as Nature intended.

—Kid and calf skin.

—Messes' sizes, 11½ to 2 . . . . . $3.50

—Children's sizes, 8½ to 11 . . . . . $3.00

—Children's sizes, 5½ to 8 . . . . . $2.50

—Infant's sizes, 3 to 5 . . . . . $2.00

—Second Floor.

Munsung Underwear for Men

WE recommend Munsung Underwear, because there is no better underwear made. It is durable—the fit won't wash out—it is tailored to fit right—it is well finished—the buttons are sewed on to stay—the seams are smooth.

—We guarantee Munsung Wear to prove satisfactory.

—A heavy silk and wool . . . . . $5.00

—A medium weight silk and wool . . . . . $4.50

—An all wool suit, in natural gray . . . . . $4.50

—Medium and heavy, 50 per cent wool at . . . $3.00

—A 75 per cent wool, in natural gray . . . . . $2.50

—A 50 per cent natural gray wool at . . . . . $2.00

—And excellent cotton Suits at . . . . . $1.00, $1.25, $1.50

—F. P. Co., First Floor.

Fraser-Paterson Co

SECOND AT UNIVERSITY

Lunch in the Tea Room on Saturday Home Cooking—6th Floor

The Best Values in $25.00 Coats for Women

THAT is what women tell us about our Coats. Be that as it may, we have the largest line at this price we have ever had. The Coats are the smartest styles of the season, the materials are excellent qualities. The colors include the most wanted. Many are fur trimmed, many are velvet trimmed.

—Every day new Coats arrive to sell at this price. Large new shipments have been received just in time to make Saturday's selection larger than ever.

—There are well over two hundred Coats to choose from; plenty of every size—so many, choosing is an easy matter. The Coats are better tailored than is usual in $25.00 Coats this season.

—Altogether we are very proud of our assortment, and wish every woman who wants a new Coat could see the assortment tomorrow at . . . . . $25.00

—Fraser-Paterson Co., Third Floor.

SATURDAY FEATURE

50 Girls' New Coats, Special $4.95 Each

A SPECIAL PURCHASE will be placed on sale Saturday. An opportunity for just fifty girls to secure new Winter Coats at a mighty low special price.

—The styles are very smart—the new effects. The materials are zibelines, wool astrachans, velours, in navy blue, Java, Russian, and a line of snappy soft autumn colors in checks and stripes.

—The collars are large and are trimmed with wool fur or velvet. Sizes 6 to 14 years. Special . . . . . $4.95

—Fraser-Paterson Co., Third Floor.

Serviceable Cotton Hose for Women, 35c Pair, 3 Pairs $1.00

A SHIPMENT just received of a splendid, durable, good looking Cotton Stocking that cannot be bought today at a price that will allow its being sold at 35c.

—Medium weight, fine ribbed; double soles, heels and toes; double garter top; black only; pair. 35c

GIRLS' COTTON HOSE 15c PAIR

A very serviceable, medium weight Cotton Stocking for girls; all sizes; fine ribbed; pair. 15c

—Fraser-Paterson Co., First Floor.

Women's Silk Top Union Suits $1.25

FINE Venetian silk top, finished in band style; cotton body, of nice, firm quality. White, flesh and white body with flesh top.

—Sizes 4, 5, 6 and 7. A splendid value at . . . . . $1.25

—Complete new stocks of Munsung Union Suits for women. All sizes. All regular numbers.

—Fraser-Paterson Co., First Floor.

Remarkable Saturday Selling of 250 Smart New Trimmed Hats $4.95 Each Worth $7.50 to $12.50 Regularly

A SALE that is the result of another extraordinary special purchase which arrived this week. Two hundred and fifty beautiful Hats—correct styles—a wide range of styles, dozens and dozens of different trimmings. These Hats are all of splendid quality, and represent some of the very best values we have yet offered in our extraordinary Saturday events at $4.95.

—These are new Hats, just received, sent out to us from the East for the purpose of offering for Saturday another remarkable opportunity. Choose Saturday at . . . . . $4.95

—Fraser-Paterson Co., Third Floor.

New Serge Skirts for Girls of 6 to 14

ANOTHER shipment just received to reinforce the depleted ranks of those received a short time ago, which filled a long felt want.

—These new arrivals are made of durable serges in smart plaid styles.

—At $2.50—Plain navy serge, and navy with ombre stripes of red and brown.

—At $2.75—Plain navy with waist attached.

—At $4.50—Imported serge in navy blue, with waist attached.

—Fraser-Paterson Co., Third Floor.

Smart New Plaid Silk Blouses $7.50

THESE new Plaid Silk Blouses illustrate one of the latest fashion ideas—they are indeed smart, and offer a pleasing variation from other styles now in favor.

—Made of excellent quality taffeta, have large sailor collars, and the collar and cuffs are of plain color, to harmonize with the plaids.

—Special values at . . . . . $7.50

—Fraser-Paterson Co., First Floor.

500 New Handkerchiefs at 25c Each

A LOT just opened—fresh, dainty, new, recently imported. Fine, soft, sheer, pure linen, with ½-inch hemstitched hems and the embroidery work is in exquisite floral