New-Rich Work as Servants to Learn Manners

LONDON.—(By Mail).—On her return from the Riviera a certain widowed duchess found the domestic staff at her castle in the south of England needed replenishment. Advertisement was made in the want columns and a parlor maid was engaged. She brought the usual references which were, as usual, accepted unchallenged.

Her grace noticed the girl because she was unusually pretty, with gentle ways and quick intelligence. All went smoothly until her first afternoon off. It appears that a magnificent Rolls-Royce then called for the new maid, who, dressed in a quiet suit of tweed, was handed in by a liveried chauffeur and drove away thru the park. At the proper hour she returned in the car and was conducted to the servants' door by the chauffeur.

"The servants' hall hummed with gossip, which ultimately reached her grace's ears. The new maid was sent for and questioned. "I will not deceive you, madam," said the girl. "It is true that my car brought me here when I came and I went out in it yesterday. I do not belong to the servant class. My father grew very rich during the war. He would be called a profiteer. He is an honest, loyal Englishman enriched thru circumstances over which he had no control. We come from the North. My father has bought a Tudor castle, where we are going to live when we have learned how. And in order to learn how, we daughters—three of us—have gone into service with people who were born to the position we must take in the new order."

The duchess was too surprised to speak and the girl went on. "At first we tried to hire people to coach us, but they were all vulgar imposters. We soon found that out, for we are honest, shrewd folk. It was too late for us to go to school. My brother had become a major, so he is a gentleman. Now he is traveling abroad. But for us girls there was no other way.—three of us—have gone into service with people who were born to the position we must take in the new order."

UNDERVESTS

Glove silk undervests are most practical for the girl who desires to achieve personal daintiness. They are clinging, they do not wrinkle and, carefully laundered, will last long. Those with self shoulder straps are most comfortable.

WHITE VEILING

White veiling is having a tremendous vogue and most of the time it is dotted with variously colored chenille.
