MRS. JOHN N. PENLINGTON BRINGS TOKYO ART HERE

Mrs. John Newton Penlington (formerly Zoe Kincaid) of Tokyo, Japan, wearing her unusual and handsome string of Japanese pearls.

BY DOROTHY FAY GOULD

People with a world contact, who are passing thru our city, are particularly interesting just now when connected with the great Asiatic continent in which, whether we wish it or not, we are being brought into close relationship. Mrs. John Newton Penlington, who is the wife of the Tokio correspondent of the London Times, sister of Prof. Trevor Kincaid, of the University of Washington, is now at the Sorrento Hotel, surrounded by her remarkable collection of Asiatic material on the art of the theatre, both the ancient and the very up-to-date art of the present. In her 12 years' absence from the Northwest she has had exceptional opportunities of meeting the people of the Far East, and is able to interpret them to us as no Occidental has yet done, especially on account of her work with her husband in his widely circulated paper, "The Far East."

In her two rooms at the Hotel Sorrento, the walls are hung with billboards by Torii, the great theatre artist of Japan, all new; others by members of his "school," first prints of the block of portraits of famous actors. "No," fans used in the classic mask dramas are stuck here and there, strangely gold and red in a drab hotel room. Forty prints, given her by an old man, that no one could possibly get today, are on one window sill, 100 color prints of the "No," and a collection of colored motifs of Japanese costumes, costing $50 over there, lie on the couch. Such poetic designs as the "blue magpie and weeping cherry tree on a red background" describes one. Pictures by Fukaya, the artist, who devotes his time to painting the theatre, stand against the wall. Well defined paintings of the three types of theatre, volumes of rare books and innumerable photographs are everywhere. The room contains a veritable treasure house for the eye and the mind to feast upon.

Due to the fact that Lord Northcliffe, for whose paper Mrs. Penlington's husband is the Tokio correspondent, is en route to Tokio, Mr. Penlington has changed his plan of coming to Seattle in September, and is obliged to remain in the East. Instead of going to London, where she had planned to publish her material on "Kabuki," the popular theatre of Japan, she is returning home September 16. However, accompanied by her husband, she expects to fulfill this mission after the Christmas holidays, but she will make the trip via India.

Should you desire to get in contact with the vigor of her personality (for she is bubbling over with material fascinating and unknown here), don't fail to attend the public lecture she will give at the Cornish School on Oriental Drama Tuesday afternoon, August 20, at 2:15. And, if you are a member of the Sunset club, attend the talk there September 7. The drama with the Oriental is woven into the very life, not only of the intellectual, but of the masses. Thru it, the history, not only that of the traditional past but also the eternal problems and the latest fads of the present. Their theatres are not supported by the state or any institution, but are maintained solely by the popular attendance. Nor are the theatres controlled by a managerial class, but by the actors themselves. (New York actors attempted last year but failed at a similar control of their theatres.)

It is perhaps not fully understood in this country, where a few distinctive types of drama are produced. The theatre to which belongs the most skilled and renowned actors is known as the "No," which crystallized some 500 years ago and expresses the aristocratic art of the theatre. It is a perfected special type distinct from the theatre of the people. The plays are a series of 250 written by a group of artists and handed down thru the ages from father to son. The unknown group authors brought perhaps to have been Buddhist priests, it is the most spiritual stage in the world, a subjective theatre.

The stage for these, the now indoors, was originally a platform over doors, approached by a bridge. It has been taken indoors, however, with the result that the audiences see the play from three sides. The platform is of highly polished wood—a rich contrast to the brilliant costumes. On one side sits the chorus, on the other the property men and at the back the musicians. The actors approach along the corridor or old bridge in full view of the audience.

One of the striking characteristics is the use of the mask, which, it might be interesting to note, is just coming into use in this country. Benda has made some famous ones, among them one for a new dance for Boia. The richness, beauty and symbolic story is in the very fabric of the costumes, as illustrated by a magnificent set of volumes Mrs. Penlington has here, produced in Japan, and not owned by any libraries elsewhere and never yet brought to European eyes. A typical "No" play is the "Okunaka," interpreted by Y. Kanze and given in honor of peace on Armistice Day. It is 400 years old, more ancient than Chaucer or Shakespeare, and the masks are so old as to be priceless treasures. What keeps the interest in these plays, from year to year, is the fact that they are variously interpreted by actors of great intellect and power.

The theatre on which Mrs. Penlington has prepared her first volume is of the type known as Kabuki, the popular theatre, the theatre in which they do not use masks nor are they circumscribed by tradition. Such plays are given as was given in Seattle last winter in the local Japanese theatre, "The Razor," which illustrates this group. The theatre itself is constructed more like our male actors take all feminine parts, as they do in all the Japanese theatres, even the "this particular type of theatre was founded by a woman, Okuni. This is the theatre to which the audiences go at 12 and stay till 10 p. m. We can understand its popularity when we see the picture of Mrs. Penlington's painted at the time Admiral Perry landed in Japan. Everyone sits about, elbow on the rail, enjoying hugely the play, and their temptations as well as other delicacies. It would add so much to the enjoyment of our theatre if we didn't have to sit in stiff seats without being able to huddle. No wonder the theatre in Japan is as popular as our ball games. Matsumoto Koshiro is one of the most versatile actors in Japan. He is a wonderful dancer, head of a famous dancing school, and is a great mimic. He took the part of Napoleon in one play and of Townsend Harris, first American minister to Japan, on another occasion.

The third type is called the doll theatre. In this marionettes, life size, are manipulated by five or six actors. Five cover their faces with black cloths, the sixth keeps his face expressionless. The interest in the story acted, it is said, keeps one from noticing them as they manipulate the figure in gestures and movements most cleverly.

The big theatre of this type is in Osaka. There are 1,000 plays written for these dolls. As the dolls act at a lacquer desk, a minstrel sings and reads a ballad describing the story and musicians play according to the feeling of the story.

To hear Mrs. Penlington talk is to find the seemingly incomprehensible Oriental theatrical art human and full of a charm unique and fascinating. Don't miss her talk Tuesday, the 30th.

Cynthia Grey:

Woman Who Wed Man Years Older, Writes Her Experience for Another Girl Contemplating Same Step.

Dear Miss Grey: May I tell my experience for the benefit of "Another Bewildered"?

Ten years ago, just after the death of my mother, when, as I felt, my world was all chaos, a man 15 years my senior (not 22 years as in your case) courted me and we were married.

While we were engaged, which was the greater part of a year, he rarely took me out, as I thought on account of my recent bereavement, but I know now it was to save the dollars.

As I was nearer 30 than 20 and had plenty of former company, I felt there was not much "love" in our regard for each other, but he was so steady and thrifty, and how he could talk religion! On that basis I was willing to marry, feeling that as we were both Bible readers we were building on a firmer foundation than love—thereby displaying my ignorance of one of life's great fundamentals.

The span was deceived in me you see, as I was not my normal self at this time. Added to this, our bringing up was as opposite as the poles.

But here is the point I want most for Miss Eighteen to consider provided she wants babies, as I did. Does the man in his 40's care to have them come? My husband did not. However, I am the mother of three and their father is too old to get the enjoyment I get from their "senseless prattle" and more "senseless actions." His children should be grown men and women by now.

There are many other unpleasant angles from which to view our ill-fated marriage, also. In concluding I would ask you: Does it pay to take such a chance when there are so many desirable young men nearer your own age?

OUT-OF-TOWN READER.
Asks Address of Prohibition Director
Dear Miss Grey: Can you tell me

MISS GREY will receive readers of this department at the Star office on Tuesdays from 9 to 4, and at other times by appointment. Please do not come on other days than Tuesday unless you have an appointment with Miss Grey, as unexpected visitors interfere with her writing.

Would Gain Legal Possession of Child

Dear Miss Grey: I am coming to you as many others do for you to give me advice. My husband and I have our little niece. Her father died when she was a wee baby and her mother passed away some months ago. Now do you think we should adopt her? We are going to have her as our own, as it was her mother's wish, and we have letters and witnesses who will prove it. Do you think her stepfather, as her mother married again, could touch her in any way as her mother did not want him to bring her up? Or do you think we should adopt her outright. But who would sign the papers, as both parents are dead? I wouldn't like to raise her to young womanhood then have her taken away from us by someone. Is there any possible way her stepfather could?

I do not believe you need worry about your niece's stepfather possessing her, as long as her mother wished her to remain in your care. However, if you want to be on the safe side, you should take the matter up with Juvenile Judge King, Dykeman, 200 Broadway, city.

Unless the young man has told you he was engaged, or the engagement has been formally announced, you should pay no attention to the rumor. If it is true, you can do no more than you are now. Hard work, interest in life in general, the society of many friends, always proves a cure-all for a broken heart in the course of time.

After the show, we'll go to Boldt.—Advertisement.
