I WANT A DOLLAR.

"I want a dollar that I can spend in any part of the world," said Mr. Goldbug. He is now anxious to take some of the government's certificates of indebtedness—the despised greenback. We have always contended that money issued by the government is good enough and now that Mr. Goldbug has come around to that belief we see no reason why a currency might not be issued by the government based on gold and silver. That is the money of the people and there comes times when even the Wall street speculators and the millionaire trust magnates will take such money and say it is good medicine. It is the proper remedy now as it was the remedy in 1896. The credit of the government is all that is necessary to make currency absolutely safe and good, but it has taken about ten years to prove that the advocates of free coinage of silver and the issuance of money by the government is the only safeguard against money stringency. The people have absolute confidence in the government and it alone can issue the necessary currency without creating distrust.

Mr. Goldbug is now shouting: "I want a dollar that I can spend at home."

With all the seriousness attached to the financial situation, it is not devoid of the amusing and ridiculous. The Spokesman-Review and many other gold bug papers and speculators who, in 1896 could see no money worth having aside from gold, are now whooping it up for clearing house certificates, certificates of indebtedness and all kinds of "rag" money. The free silver advocates can stand aside and enjoy the acts of these acrobats.

President Roosevelt has invited the governors of all the states to assemble at the White House in May to discuss means of conserving our natural resources. Such a meeting must result in much good to the nation. But it should also include the discussion of uniform divorce laws, pure food laws and railway legislation. A uniformity of legislation covering these subjects would be most advantageous to the people.

Praise For American Women.
 The happy marriage question is agitating the English public, and comparison has been made between English and American women as mates for continental Europeans. Recently the London Chronicle cited the views of a Frenchwoman who asserts that the American woman is the more successful in foreign alliances. One of the reasons given is that "she makes her husband proud of his wife."

This observer says that the Englishwoman remains aggressively English wherever she is placed. Strange to say, the unions of Englishmen with German women are said to turn out happily. But in cosmopolitan circles a wife must play many parts, that of companion to her husband as well as housekeeper and mother, and in the role of companion the American wife surpasses the English.

According to Consul General Michael of Calcutta, England is now giving "benighted" India the lowest letter and parcel postage rate of any country in the world. Two cents will carry four ounces of letter mail, and the rates for parcels is 4 cents per pound. By a special rate letters under one-half ounce in weight are carried for 1 cent.

For the first time in the history of the empire the aristocratic ladies of China attended receptions, poured tea and waited on tables in honor of the visit of Secretary Taft.

According to an exchange, soap has been known to the world for 3,000 years, and yet some men regard it an innovation too recent to be trifled with.

Washington as a prohibition city would enable statesmen to give banquets without any fear of embarrassing cocktail incidents.

When automobile owners look at their budgets for repairs they wonder why they are the objects of envy in stead of pity.

What a wild hurroo is made over the proposition to restore the obsolete custom of study in colleges!

That story about a "war on pompousness" in Pittsburg turned out to be a hair raising hoax.

Today's news today if you read the Evening Press.

Eating to "Keep Up Steam."
 The medical specialists, Sir Crichton-Browne of London and Dr. Wood-Hutchinson, an English trained physician now settled in this country, have recently delivered views on the "perfect diet" which virtually amount to a condemnation of all food fads. Dr. Crichton-Browne says that food fads are in the nature of a deprivation, while Dr. Hutchinson insists that intelligent selection of the food which the individual system demands is the only safeguard. The latter declares that meat eaters are the dominant and conquering strain among men.

The evil of eating too much is soon apparent and can be corrected, while the effects of eating too little are slow of development and may bring about fits not connected with the digestive organs. We look upon food as the fuel of the human engine, and the components of every meal should be selected with a view to the work to be done. The theories of Mr. Fletcher with regard to slow and perfect mastication are not new, for there is scarcely a mother in the land who is not saying daily to her children and perhaps to some adults around her table that food should be chewed fine and not bolted. Recently Mr. Fletcher has added another article to his creed, which is that the human being needs no breakfast. He says that a night's rest gives the body all the nourishment necessary and that the breakfast appetite is only a habit. A radical swing, this, from the every day notion that a person who comes to the breakfast table without an appetite needs an interview with the medicine man.

In sleep a change of tissues takes place in the body, and food must follow in order to restore harmony. Many doctors insist that a morning appetite must be had even if it takes a mile walk to bring it around. The question is not as to how one feels on a breakfast or the going without, but the situation two or three hours later, after the steam stored up in sleep has been worked out. German and French workmen eat light breakfasts, but they take food at 11 o'clock to make up for it. The general experience of the world sustains those doctors who teach that man must feed himself with the same care and liberality which he bestows upon his work animals, and that is according to the tasks on hand. In the long run the appetite which has not been fampered with is the safest guide as to what it wants and when it wants it.

The Sly Japs.
 It turns out that the lay public and war experts as well were wide of the mark in supposing that the finish fight between the Russian and Japanese fleets had added materially to the world's information as to armored ships and modern gun fire. The Japs were victors and barely gave their foe time to see just how they did it. And they themselves "ain't sayin' nuffin." They have made no statement, and no word has leaked out from Japanese naval headquarters as to what features or features of their armament gave them the superiority.

There were half a dozen questions, more or less, which experts wished might be decided in actual battle with respect to the efficiency of certain kinds of shells, of powder, of armor, the ranges which regulate efficiency, and so on. The Japs sank the Russian ships, and they raised them, but they have never allowed outsiders to gain the slightest information from the tell-tale wrecks. This is clearly a Japanese right, but it is well to remember that people who know the Japanese character say this secretiveness is a national trait and extends to every field of activity.

Andrew Carnegie has given away about $125,000,000 in the past thirty years. But he has built no churches, missions, Young Men's Christian associations, soup kitchens or hospitals. Outside of a large fund for the relief of injured or needy steel workers and a long private pension list, he has given nothing to the sick or the poor. "Nothing for the submerged tenth" has been the motto of this Scottish stote.

The shooting of a hunter for a deer in the Adirondacks and the reported decrease of hunters in the Maine woods have, of course, no relation to cause and effect.

A New York theater manager says he has all the money he wants. Perhaps the secret lies in the sign "Free List Suspended" which stares at the pass send from the box office.

CAMP ON HOTEL ROOF.

Philadelphia Hostelry Supplies Tents For Guests Who Want Them.
 Anybody who yearns to "sleep under the stars," who finds a big bedroom too confining, can camp out on the roof of the Bellevue-Stratford hotel, Philadelphia, now, says a Philadelphia special to the New York World.

A judge arrived at the Bellevue-Stratford from the Adirondacks recently. Next day he complained that the street noises kept him awake and that anyhow a room was too pent up for a man who had been sleeping out of doors. So the manager pitched a tent on the roof, which is incased in glass. The judge has been sleeping like a top, twenty stories up, 310 feet above the street.

Soon there will be a grove of little pine and spruce trees on the roof in which will stand twenty tents, each one with a portable bathtub and a telephone. Servants, costumed as guides, probably will be in attendance, but the campers must eat their venison and bear steaks in the hotel dining rooms. If the camp's atmosphere grows too close the glass dome can be opened. Then the wind will whistle through the trees. The camp will be maintained all winter probably.

FRESH FISH AT SEA.

Steamship Amerika Has a Trout Pool For Epicures.

On a recent voyage of the steamship Amerika there was a novelty for the passengers. There were four tanks stocked with trout and carp on the deck, and the fish swam around until they fascinated some passenger, who told the steward which one he wanted, and then it was caught and cooked for him.

The fish were in charge of Ernest Marquandt. Dr. George L. Erlwein, an aquarist of Hamburg, had the task of keeping the fish healthy, and all that were not eaten made the trip in good condition. The steward said that about 500 trout and 150 carp were sold on the voyage.

The tanks, big zinc affairs, filled with fresh water, are housed away up on the top of the ship, near the base of the smokestacks. The water is supplied with fresh oxygen by pumping it into the tops of little towers, where through punctures the fresh air comes in touch with it, and thus the trout are kept alive and jumping.

Tragedy at the Telephone.

Answering in person a hurry call on the wire from Hammonton, N. J., Mrs. Jeanette Coast, chief operator in the Bell Telephone company main exchange in Atlantic City, listened to an account of the death of her own husband, Ralph Coast, chief of linemen, and then fell in a faint. Coast lost his balance while working at the top of a sixty foot pole on the outskirts of Hammonton, but managed to grip a cross arm as he fell. Men rushed to his aid, but before they could ascend the pole his strength gave out and he fell to his death. Those who sent the news to Hammonton had no idea of the identity of the receiver until they heard her shriek at the close of the report.
