Stahl Talks to Players

"No Short Cut to Mastery of Baseball," He Says.

How to Become a Good Batter and Other Seasonable Hints.

"These 'Baseball Made Easy' brochures and 'How to Become a Ball Player by Correspondence' treatises are only calculated to bother and mystify the young fellow just learning the game," said Captain Jake Stahl of the Washington Americans recently when asked for some points for the beginner.

"There isn't any short cut to a mastery of baseball. It's just a matter of plugging away all the time, like learning the violin or shorthand. The only literary end of the game worth paying any attention to is the book of rules. The young fellow who hopes to become a worth while ball player must make the book of rules his catechism. When he gets the regulations of the game as pat as he can his intuition and the experience he gets in actual play will carry him along if he has the goods to go in with. I don't go so far as to say that all ball players are born and none made. I'd be handing myself out if I said that, for I made a sad hash of it when I first started in the game. I began as a pitcher, and it makes me laugh to remember what a botch I was at that end of it. But the top notch players, when you run them over, are all born players, and the artificial players rarely mount to Class A.

"First rate batsmen, for example, are always spongy, aggressive chaps, fellows who possess somewhat pugnacious dispositions and who are afraid of nothing that walks, swims or flies. You can always spot a bad batsman by the way he pulls away from the plate. I hate to see a ball player do that. It always looks cowardly to me.

"The batsman who draws away from the plate is always a perfect mark for the pitcher. The tosser has such a clubbit at his mercy and feeds him any old thing that he likes, confident that he will be able to fool the nerveless one.

"I like to see a batsman stand right over the rock and await the pitcher's onset like a soldier. It depends upon a batsman's eye and his physical ability as to whether he'd better just meet the ball with his bat or take a full power swing at it. I nearly always try to soak it with all my strength when I get a good one coming along. I strike out pretty often trying to put them away back deep, but I wasn't made to just tap them, and I've got to hit the way I was made to hit. Some batsmen, however, go so wide of the mark when they put their full force into their swings that it's best for them just to meet the ball and thereby improve their chances of finding it.

"The full force hitter is bound to decrease his chance of nailing it by the momentum of his swing, and some naturally fine batsmen can't hit a balloon when they put all of their power into the swing.

"Willie Keeler is one of the batsmen who have just to meet it. He used to try to soak it when he first began to play ball, but he never got by that way. His scheme now is to grab the club by the middle and just tap the sphere on the nose with a sort of half arm swing when he sees the one coming that he likes, and his batting average tells the story of how he gets away with the kind of hitting that he is best suited for.

"While I don't like to see a batsman make a mark of himself by falling for everything the pitcher has a mind to shoot at him, still I have good reasons to hate to see a batsman wait too long for the kind he wants or thinks he wants.

"I like to see a batsman take a clout at every good one, irrespective of how many balls and strikes have been called on him. Of course when a batsman sees that a pitcher is exploding it he his cue to wait till the last minute, but I believe in going after everything good that a steady pitcher sends along."
