THE SHOWING WE MAKE

In his speech in Mobile a few weeks ago, President Wilson referred to our want of a merchant marine and expressed the idea that if private enterprise does not soon find a means to restore it, the government will have to take it in hand.

So we suspect that on the meeting of congress, the president will renew his recommendation to buy merchant ships and run them on government account.

That would be better than nothing, but it is not business of the government of a republic like ours to engage in private business which can be much better done by private individuals. Ours is a great productive nation. It has advanced so far that its business on land is closely intertwined with its commerce on the sea. This has been most strikingly shown since the mad men in Europe rushed into war last August.

It has crippled our business on land, and made clear how we for half a century have been dependant upon outside nations to do our work on the sea.

The ships that have done our work have not been government owned, but every one of them has been helped by the government of its own country. The examples of those countries should be worth something to us.

England has paid out in subsidies to her ships $450,000,000 in the past fifty years. Up to the close of the Franco-Prussian war, Germany had no merchant marine, and her people were flocking to other lands. Then she made a new departure. She said to her people: Build ships and run them, bring us your accounts and if you lose money the government will make you whole. That was done. In a little time she had to begin building new factories. In a short time her people ceased searching for homes in foreign countries, because remunerative work was provided at home. In a few years her land was covered with factories; she was able to build a great navy, to support the greatest army in the world. In the meantime her population increased 70 per cent, but she found work for them all, and gathered wealth enough in trade with foreign lands, to make her believe she could maintain a successful war against allied Europe.

Germany has an area of 208,830 square miles of naturally poor soil, 53,000 more miles than California, 57,000 less miles than Texas. She was exceedingly poor forty-five years ago, she became rich through her factories and ships, though most of her raw material she had to buy abroad and import. We have limitless raw material, a good many factorials but on oversea marine, and to our shame on an area fifteen times as great as Germany our business is confused and congested and tens of thousands of men are seeking employment—Goodwin's Weekly.

Mustard of various kinds is becoming a real menace to the farmeas on Camas prairie but it is no more of a menace to successful agriculture than the man who farms large tracts of Indian land and make no pretence of keeping down these noxious weeds. One of the best methods of fighting the spread of wild mustard would be to limit the leasing of Indian lands to any man in excess of 320 acres. Then the land will be farmed more thoroughly and scientifically, better crops grown, the land kept free from noxious weeds and there will be more people on the land.
