DEATH OF OLD RESIDENT.

On Sunday, May 20, the body of Mrs. Josephine Schmidt was laid to rest in the St. Vincent De Paul cemetery. Sts. John Chapter, Eastern Star assisted by Brothers Thomas and Brown, conducted the services in a beautiful and impressive manner. Both Bros. Brown and Thomas spoke of the Christian life that the deceased had lived and of her many kind and charitable acts and of her having lived the allotted time being 50 years and eight months at the time of her death. At the home of the deceased, 2227 Columbus street, the floral tributes sent by numerous friends and the graves of the Woodmen Circle and Eastern Star filled the parlor and adjoining rooms with their fragrance and testified the high esteem in which she was held. Being an old resident of Algiers, her death was a shock to her many friends. The casket was borne by eight of her grandsons, attired in white and wearing white carnations and evergreen, signifying purity, light and immortality. When the casket was placed in the tomb, each one of the grandsons deposited the carnation and evergreen on the casket. During the closing of the tomb, the Eastern Star sang "Nearer My God to Thee." At the house, when the ministers had performed their services, "Asleep in Jesus" and "My Mother" were sung by Mrs. Kearny.

 God bless our saddest mother.
 And all mothers too!
 Her life was spent for others.
 Through all her years we know.
 Her loving hands shall lead us.
 Her God shall be our guide.
 Her blessings rest upon us.
 Whatever may befall.
 But, oh! beyond this shadow land,
 Where all is bright and fair,
 We know full well those dear old hands
 Will palms of victory bear;
 Where crystal streams, through endless years,
 Flood over golden sands,
 And where the old are young again,
 We'll clasp our mother's hands.

CAUGHT

By ARTHUR PEACH.

Merriman was seated at the front window of his club. The common spread out before him in its dim promise of spring did not brighten his thoughts. He was weary of the city and all it suggested. Then came the thought that made him sit up.

Far up in the northern part of Maine he had a camp which was the pride of his heart. For the last three seasons, it had been broken into by thieves in spite of the man he had hired to look after it. Much valuable stuff had been stolen, and the preceding fall he had told his old guide, Acton, that if he did not stop the thieving he would lose his job. But Merriman was half suspicious.

So he decided to make a flying trip to the camp.
 He made his preparations and cleaned up his business affairs in a day. At the close of the next, he reached the lake.

When he reached camp, the first signs he saw were tracks of small shoes from the door of the camp to the dock.

Merriman groaned as he thought of what would confront him when he opened the door—everything in disorder and almost everything that was valuable at all missing.

Just what he expected! Things were even more upset than they were the last time.

Angry and disgusted, he threw off his coat and hat and began an attempt to bring some kind of order out of the chaos.

Suddenly a shadow filled the room. He turned.

In the doorway stood a girl, straight as a reed and graceful as a fawn on the verge of flight. His eyes went to her face and he saw—he was looking into the blue end of an automatic revolver! "Put on your coat and come with me. I guess we've got you now."

The girl evidently regarded him as a thief, but who she was he had not the slightest idea.

Suddenly it occurred to him that there was a chance for adventure—an adventure with a fair young goddess of the north woods. He would follow the lure, no matter where it led him.

Her eyes were clear and bright and steady, albeit her face was pale.
 "Now put your hands over your head and come out!" she ordered.
 Merriman did as she directed.

"Go now down to the dock. Get into that canoe. Take the bow—with your back toward me!" she commanded.
 He followed her direction implicitly. The canoe left the shore, and under the impulse of a pair of vigorous young arms began to pick up speed.

"I wonder where I'm headed for now," thought Merriman. "I wonder if they have lady sheriffs up here this early."

He looked back at her once and saw a vision of a full-throated, rosy girl, arms round yet muscular, driving the paddle like an Indian expert, the automatic within easy grasp in the pocket of her jacket.

A mile or so down the river she turned the canoe, and paddling it backward to the shore, jumped out and ordered him to do likewise.

A path ran from the bank back, and not far away Merriman could see the faint outlines of a shack.

At her orders, he proceeded toward the shack, and as they drew nearer she whistled shrilly and called: "Father! I have him!"

Then Merriman received his second distinct shock of that eventful afternoon. In the doorway of the shack appeared the wasted, bent figure of his old guide.

"Girl, girl, what have you done? This is Mr. Merriman!"

She moved slowly forward, her face grown pale, her eyes wide open. Then, as Merriman turned from greeting his stricken guide and held out his hand to her, she drew back hastily and her hands went to her face to hide her distress.

"It's all right," he assured her. "I'm glad to find my camp was so well guarded. I ought to apologize to you for deceiving you, but I was tremendously astonished when you appeared."

Later, while he and his old guide were smoking before the cheerful fireplace, and his fair captor was cooking the supper, Merriman heard the solution of the mystery.

She was Acton's daughter. She had grown up in a village on the coast and recently had studied to become a nurse. When her father fell ill she had come back to the camp to take care of him. She had found that his anxiety for the safety of the camp weighed heavily on his mind and she had volunteered to go up each day and see that everything was all right.

One thing still puzzled Merriman, and he asked the girl why the place was so upset.

She hesitated and blushed as she answered. "Well, when I first went there it was—so—so—"

"I understand," Merriman laughed. "It needed a good spring cleaning! I agree with you. Now, I want both of you to go with me to the camp. Jeb, this has been your home for a good many years, but I want you to leave it; you need somebody to look out for you, and I must say I am in the same fix. Will you take charge of us?" He turned to the girl.

She laughed confusedly. "As long as you are meek as you were today, I'll be willing to be responsible for your behavior!" she said.

Making Wire Solder.
 Wire solder is made by punching small holes from one-thirty-second to one-sixteenth of an inch in diameter in the bottom of a sheet-iron pan along one side, holes to be one-half inch apart. Set the pan upon a flat plate of iron or a flat stone slab, pour in the solder and tip the pan so that the solder will flow through the holes, drawing the pan along the slab fast enough to leave trains of solder cooling in the form of wires. This will require a few trials to succeed well and make the wire even.

Shall Women Propose?
 Of course women should propose. It is women who change their entire lives by matrimony, it is women who take on colossal responsibility by matrimony. The women should surely be allowed to choose the man for whom she feels herself able to work and give. Men propose; men have had it in their own hands up to now, and if they have married the wrong woman they have only themselves to blame for it.—Women of the World.
