Only One Kind of Right Action.

Rightness expresses of actions what straightness does of lines; and there can no more be two kinds of right action than there can be two kinds of straight lines.—Herbert Spencer.

The KITCHEN CABINET

What shall I have for dinner? What shall I have for tea? An omelet, a chop, or steak Or a savory fricassee? DELICIOUS HOT BREADS.

Although wheatless days in America are now a thing of the past, we have learned to like many of the substitutes and many a family will continue to use them, even with wheat flour free as usual.

Potato Biscuits.—Take one cupful of mashed potato, one cupful of flour, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of butter substitute, one tablespoonful of lard and one-half cupful of milk. Mix and sift the dry ingredients. Add these to the potatoes, using a spatula. Add the fat and gradually add the milk. Toss on a floured board and roll out to one-half inch in thickness. Cut in shape with a cutter and place in greased pans. Bake twelve to fifteen minutes.

Barley and Oats Shortcake.—Take two cupfuls of barley flour, one and one-half cupfuls of ground oats, one teaspoonful each of salt and sugar, four tablespoonfuls of fat, a pinch of soda and four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one cupful of water. Mix and bake as usual.

Cornflour Shortcake.—Take two and two-thirds cupfuls of corn flour, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of sugar, six tablespoonfuls of fat and one cupful of milk or water. Mix and bake as usual.

Oatmeal Biscuits.—Take one and one-quarter cupfuls of flour, one and one-half teaspoonfuls of baking powder, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one-half teaspoonful of salt, six tablespoonfuls of shortening and one and one-third cupfuls of oatmeal, with two-thirds of a cupful of water. Mix, adding more water if needed to make a soft dough. Roll out thin on a floured board and cut with a biscuit cutter. Bake in a moderate oven one-half hour. Less time is taken in baking if the oatmeal is parched before using.

Cornmeal Griddle Cakes.—Take one cupful of cornmeal, add one cupful of scalded milk, one egg, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, a tablespoonful each of melted shortening and molasses. Scald the meal with the milk and when cool add the other ingredients. Mix well and bake on a hot griddle.

The foundation for so many of the French candies is made from fondant. To prepare the fondant take four cupfuls of granulated sugar, one and one-half cupfuls of cold water, one-fourth of a teaspoonful of cream of tartar or a tablespoonful of corn sirup. Set on the back part of the range and let stand until the sugar is dissolved. Boil, washing down the sides to keep it from graining. The hand may be dipped into cold water quickly brushing down the sides of the pan, or a swab of white cloth may be used. Cook the sirup until a soft ball is made when dropped in cold water. Pour the sirup out on a marble slab or large platter lightly greased. Do not scrape out the saucepan or allow the last of the sirup to drip from the pan as any grainy portion will cause the whole to grain. Work the edges with a wooden spoon, turn toward the center, then knead until the mass is white and firm. Let stand for an hour or two then pack in bowl, cover with a cloth and let stand overnight. The next day the fondant may be used, but several days' standing will improve it.

To make bon-bons, add any desired flavoring and color to a small portion of fondant, then dip in melted chocolate or tinted fondant, melted over hot water. Chopped fruit of different kinds may be mixed with fondant dipped in chocolate or uncolored fondant and decorated with half a nutmeg. To make the chocolate creams that are very soft in the center, take it off before it makes a soft ball to handle. Then mix as before and put out on ice to freeze. Make in balls while very cold and dip, then they will have the very soft creamy centers.

Double Fudge.—Boil together seven minutes two cupfuls of sugar, one-half cupful of cream, two squares of chocolate and a tablespoonful of butter; beat and pour into a buttered tin to cool. Boll together two cupfuls of granulated sugar, half a cupful of cream and a tablespoonful of butter and cook ten minutes. Add a teaspoonful of vanilla, beat and pour on top of the fudge in the pan. When cool, cut in squares.

Miss Maxwell

The woman who increases the efficiency of her home is demonstrating the most practical kind of patriotism.

A FEW CANDIES.

Miss Hill proved to be the girl of the bird store. From her demure blush as she acknowledged the introduction to the eager lieutenant, he suspected that she recognized him. It was arranged that she should work with Dan that afternoon at least; but he made haste to assure his uncle that the clipping of innumerable coupons would probably necessitate another full day's work.

During the afternoon a minimum of business was transacted by Dan and his acting secretary. However he found time to tell her of the big kennels in his country place, and of his favorite pet, the ugly-looking bulldog named "Old Ironsides." "He'll try to—I mean, he could—eat that little chap in the birdstore in one mouthful," said Dan.

And Marjorie confided to him her longing to possess the "little chap." She told him how she had figured that five dollars was a sufficient sum for such a tiny puppy, and how she had been saving up a "dog fund"; and then of her disappointment at learning that the small dog had a most distinguished and high-class canine family tree—being a direct descendant of Kingmaster I—and his present owners refused to part with him for less than twenty-five dollars.

Needless to say, the puppy of unimpeachable ancestry disappeared from the store window the next day. When the president of the bank returned after lunch that noon, he found an unexpected visitor tied to his desk. A note from Dan explained the situation. It read as follows: "I am paying my charming assistant, not in coin of the realm but in the original way you see hitched to your desk. Don't dare move him. He will be called for at 5 o'clock."

Dan's uncle viewed the pup with a quizzical smile. Fortunately, he liked dogs, too. "I suppose," he remarked thoughtfully, "that you have to be fed at more or less frequent intervals, like all infants. Although—pardon my rudeness, old man—from the contour of your small anatomy you don't look as though you had room for a drop more." An excited office boy was presently sent out to procure some milk for the puppy.

Then, still holding Dan's note, his

For the third consecutive day Marjorie Hill spent 15 minutes of her noon hour gazing covetously in the store window. And for the third time Lieutenant Dan Taylor, lurching alone at his club across the street, watched her with growing curiosity.

Dan, the proud possessor of two gold service stripes and a wound stripe, was feeling rather bored after his strenuous activities of the past year. This state of affairs was possibly due to the fact that there had been no girl waiting for him "over here." His interest was aroused now for the first time since his return home.

"If it was a fur coat she was looking at so earnestly," he soliloquized, "or a platinum bracelet watch, or a rose-colored evening gown—I could understand it. But it's a bird and animal store. I wonder if it's a parrot or a canary she wants?"

While he watched the girl went inside the store. Dan hastily paid his meal check and hurried across the street. He, in turn, stared in the window at the miscellaneous assortment of livestock.

On one side some tiny white mice were huddled in a squirming heap in a cage. "No girl in her right mind would even look at those things," was the lieutenant's sarcastic comment.

On the other side of the window two white, curly-haired dogs frisked around. "Inane pups," muttered Dan. "She doesn't look like the kind of a girl who would carry one of those toy lambs around."

In the center of the window was an iron cage, and presently its occupant—a small but very fat Boston terrier—was thrust in unceremoniously. The girl inside the store leaned over to play with him for a moment, and Dan had a delightful glimpse of rosy cheeks and brown eyes. When she left Dan followed her through the noontide crowd until she entered a large bank building.

A few minutes later the president of the bank was shaking hands joyfully with the lieutenant. "It surely does make you old uncle glad to see you again, Danny," he said, "and if there's anything at all I can do for you—"

His offer was accepted with suspicious alacrity. Dan explained glibly that he wanted to look over the contents of his safety deposit box, and since his right arm was still lame, possibly he could have the assistance of one of the clerks. For answer his uncle pressed a button beside his desk. A young woman appeared almost immediately. Dan, maneuvering to a position back of her, frantically signaled to his uncle. The latter, hiding a smile, dismissed his efficient employee with some casual instructions, and asked her to send Miss Hill to him.
