DO THEY REALLY HAPPEN?

Why do you laugh when Maggie breaks her second best dinner set over Mr. Jiggs' head? Just because you have a hostile feeling for Mr. Jiggs? No, indeed, you rather like Jiggs; you laugh because you know it never could have happened, and because it's so very funny as it's drawn. Again, why do you laugh when Buster Keaton just misses falling off the top of the Woolworth building? You know that isn't funny, and yet you laugh—you laugh because you know it never in the world would have happened that way, and so it's ridiculous! Children enjoy fairy stories for somewhat the same reason.

It's queer, isn't it, when you think of it, that everything in the world that you think couldn't possibly ever happen is laughed at? If somebody suggested that while you were over the river all the streets of Algiers had been paved and swept, what would you do? Would you say, "Oh, isn't that nice!" No, most likely you'd laugh, because it could not be so. (Just to prove our point: Remember they laughed at Fulton making the first steamboat and Hargreaves inventing the spinning jenny!)
