mathematician Cauchy. He asserted, in fact, that the earth could not have existed for an infinite number of years, seeing that their sum would constitute a number necessarily always finite, being susceptible of augmentation and diminution.

"According to this observation we should be forced to conclude that the earth had a beginning, namely, its creation. The same is true for all the celestial bodies of the solar system, and for the whole universe."—Translation made for the Literary Digest.

ARBITRATION VERSUS SELF-REDESS.

As surely as the duel has given place, among individuals, to the court of justice, will the awful arbitrament of war give way to the international tribunal; also, as a corollary to this, it may be written down that as the court of justice has back of it for the enforcement of its decrees the punitive machinery of the government, so will the international court be backed by some form of international police, composed of limited naval and military forces, in which each of the signatories to the international court will be represented.

One of the brightest auguries of the dawn of a worldwide peace is to be found in the fact that it has become the fashion, during the past year or two, to speak of armies and navies as means for the preservation of peace. When the leaders of the world, be they presidents, kings, or emperors, declare that every increase in the armed strength of their respective countries is undertaken for the express purpose of preserving peace, the statement is generally accepted as sincere. Although the advocates of peace by arbitration deplore the enormous investment of treasure, time, and labor involved in the maintenance of the vast military organizations of the civilized world, they are beginning to believe that the advocates of peace by war are as anxious as they themselves that the world's peace be permanently preserved.

The establishment of the noble principle of international arbitration will be, after all, merely a repetition in the international world of a process of evolution from barbarism to civilization, which has long ago taken place in the individual national world. Far back in the beginnings of human history, the principal of self-redress was paramount. If wrong or fancied wrong was done, the injured party encompassed the death of his enemy by such ready means as might be at hand. Gradually, with the growth of intelligence, it was realized, not only that the injured party was a poor judge of his own cause, but that the principle of self-redress was subversive of the peace and happiness of the community. It was realized, also, that the man whose brain was clouded with the smoke of furious passion, was not so well qualified a judge as some third and disinterested party, who could look upon the case in dispute with an impartial eye; and so, gradually but surely, the principle of arbitration took shape and became the stable rock on which our wonderful modern system of national jurisprudence has been erected.

We have before us a lucid review of the growth of the principle of national arbitration in a pamphlet published by the Maryland Peace Society and written by James Brown Scott, lecturer international law in the George Washington and Johns Hopkins universities. He refers to the three stages which were shown in the development of the celebrated Roman judicial system, which were as follows: (1) The primary litigant submitted his controversy to an arbiter of his own choice for decision according to the conscience of a good and impartial man; (2) the magistrate or judge chosen from an official list or panel is preferred to a citizen arbitrator; (3) the administration of justice is regarded as the duty and therefore the right of the State, and a judicial system is prepared for and imposed upon the citizen.

The author of the paper sees the same unconscious development taking place in the gradual growth of arbitration between states. In early times they would choose as arbiter the Pope; in modern times, some foreign sovereign. The lack of continuity of decision in this system, which dealt with the individual case, led up to the second stage, dating from the first conference, which involved the appointment by international action of a panel of judges from which judges forming the temporary tribunal are chosen. "We stand," says the writer, "upon the very threshold of the third and final development, when nations as a whole determine that international justice is the province of the international community, and constitute a court of international justice, to which litigant states may resort in conflicts of importance." To-day, much has been done. The organization, jurisdiction, and procedure of this international tribunal have been determined. Now, we merely await the appointment of judges to establish a world-wide court, in which the nations may obtain justice as easily and readily as private suitors in national courts of justice.

The author of this paper does not go into the question of the enforcement of the findings of international arbitration. It is our belief that an international court should be backed by an army, composed of drafts from the various armies of the world previous to their disarmament, limited in numbers, and existing solely for the enforcement of its decrees.—Scientific American.
