

Dad Has Struck It.—The following story is current in Titusville. In a neighborhood on the creek lived and labored a son of Vulcan, who with his limited means, had barely enough to secure a small piece of land and to obtain a scanty living for his rising family. The ideas of his children had been taught to shoot but little in any direction toward knowledge or refinement and he little expected to be anything more than the village blacksmith.

But when the oil fever broke out, learning of the success of his neighbors in finding oil, he thought that he might while away his spare hours in drilling a hole upon his homestead lot; and having tools convenient, he went to work, and after a few weeks of patient industry was successful in obtaining a good show of oil.

It was soon noted about the village, and the blacksmith was somebody at once. He had a daughter, also, who had blossomed into maidenhood almost unnoticed and unknown, but who now became more an object of interest to the few young men in that small community. It at once became a question how to brake the ice of former indifference, and to secure a favorable acquaintance with this heiress of the oil well. For a while the natural timidity of the boys kept the aloof; but, at last, one of the boldest and best favored among them determined to try his luck, and on Sunday evening, attired in his best, resolutely marched forward and offered to escort the damsel home. Imagine his chagrin, when she turning upon him a look of lofty independence, that would have done honor to a Broadway belle, replied in language more severe than chaste:

"Nonsense; you can't come that! Dad has struck it!"—Buffalo Courier.

Serious Error by Telegraph.—A prominent gentleman being ill at Toronto, it was telegraphed to his family that "Mr. Brown is no worse." The family got it "is no more," and sent up a special train for the remains.
