Why Wee Little Chickens Are Such Good Travelers

In the current issue of Farm and Fireside a contributor shows how little chickens of one day old can be sent safely by express from 200 to 1,000 miles, and reach their destination alive and in good condition before they are fairly dried off. To-day the shipping of day-old chickens has become a leading branch of the poultry business. Thousands and thousands are shipped all over the world, all times of the year. The following extract from the article explains why such small chickens can be shipped so far:

"Some people do not know that a chick, which escape from the shell in which it has been a prisoner for three weeks, will stand a lot of abuse and live provided you are not too harsh with it. Nature has provided a supply of nourishment for the little fellow in the form of the yolk of the egg from which it is hatched. As the chick comes from the shell with the undigested yolk yet in his body, it furnishes all the food that the chick needs for the first forty-eight hours of its life. When the little chicks are packed away for several hours during shipment they continue to gain strength and are much better off than if they were exposed to the sudden changes of running in and out of the hover of the brooder. And these are the reasons why so many are sent and reach their destination in safety."

Automobiles Bringing Truck Gardeners Nearer to Their Market

In the current issue of Farm and Fireside Thomas Greiner, editor of the Gardening department, tells how the automobile is benefiting the truck gardener. Mr. Greiner is one of the best practical gardening experts in the United States. He says:

"Up to a few years ago we used to think growing vegetables for direct sale to consumers was impracticable and out of the question where more than five or six miles were between grower and buyer. But distances now cuts much less of a figure than formerly. Carrying your products on a modern auto-truck, you can reach your customer twenty miles from your place in a little over an hour's time. You can do your peddling in less time than when you drove a horse and wagon, do not have to stop for feeding and resting your horses and will get home in a little over an hour after you have disposed of your load."
