If you have sent a telegram today you are one cent better off than you would have been if you had sent it Friday. Manager Fisher, of the Western Union has been instructed by his company to discontinue the collection of one cent war tax revenue on telegrams, effective today, and henceforth, that worrisome "copper" will not have to be carried in the vest pocket to pay for the war in Europe. INTERESTING TO LOUISIANA

The night farmers' observation tour was leaving Chicago, William Morrissey, of Clay, Robinson and Company, live stock commission men, came to the train with the news that two carloads of Louisiana beeves had sold at $10.25 per cwt., or a little better than ten cents a pound. By being bred and started in Louisiana and finished in Illinois there was no question of tick territory and embargoes involved. H. M. Seymour having the unusual advantage of farms in both states. Mr. Seymour has his Louisiana ranch at Wilson where he bought a run-down cotton farm and converted it into a cattle proposition raising in 300 head of high grade Hereford, besides a lot of two-year old and yearling heifers. The steer calves were kept until fall and then shipped to the other Seymour farm in Adams county, Illinois where the calves were given a little grain during the winter and then kept on pasture, stalk fields and roughage until the January following when they were put into the feed-lot and fed shock corn until the grass was again good. After that they received all the corn they could eat with two pounds of cotton seed meal on good grass until sent to market. The choicest heifers were kept for breeding stock only the remainder being sold. When Louisiana is tick free he will be able to make still more profit by conducting the entire process of preparation on his farm in this state.

The Louisiana extension service has made a new departure in the way of educating the farmers, using the country press as its happy medium. There is no more patriotic press than that of this state, but the rural weekly has its limitations in the matter of type setting. The editors all recognize the great value of and great interest in agricultural information, but owing to their facilities, or lack of them, they were able to make very little use of bulletins and even of the briefer articles in the press sheets of the Louisiana State University. M. G. Osborn, who edits the latter saw the situation and the way to meet it. The extension department recognized his recommendation as excellent and authorized him to carry it out. The expedient is free plate service. The experts of the college and affiliated agricultural teaching agencies prepare short, timely articles on which they consider the farmers would like to be posted, and these are headlined and arranged into a solid page, which is then electrotyped and forwarded prepaid to the various rural periodicals. Most of these use a quantity of what is known as plate matter, some of which they will be glad to replace with farm stories. All they have to do is either put the entire plate on the press or chisel out as much as they deem their readers will assimilate. When the issue is printed, they are expected to ship back the metal which is then cast into more live matter, the stream of plates flowing regular meantime. In that way the university will reach many more farmers each week, and if the effect is in keeping it will regard the money as well spent. Hay fever was supposed to be a metropolitan malady. While it is a weed disease and there are more weeds in the country, especially around farms and sections where intensive cultivation and clean fields are not the rule, it was thought that the farmer working in the open air acquired higher resistance which more than offset his greater exposure. It was therefore a source of much surprise when a questionnaire sent out by Dr. Oscar Dowling, president of the State Board of Health revealed that 25 per cent of the cases in Louisiana existed among farmers. The interest of the national and other authorities has been aroused and it is desired to pursue the subject deeper in order to arrive at the most accurate figures. The United States Public Health Service has not only taken up the affliction as a national concern but it has given Louisiana credit for valuable and able pioneer work by publishing a pamphlet on hay fever and its prevention, prepared by Dr. William Scheppegegrell, of New Orleans who is also president of the American Hay Fever Prevention Association.
