PRUNING FARM APPLE TREES

Regulated More in Accordance With Owner's Conditions Than in General Orchard.

Pruning of apple trees on the general farm is regulated more in accordance with the owner's farm conditions than where orcharding is the main occupation. The trees must be shaped to enable the farmer and his team to make satisfactory progress with plow, cultivator and harrow. When quite young, the trees are trained to grow straight and tall for several years, until the lower branches can be spared and the tree assumes a permanent form. This can generally be accomplished within a few years after planting. No permanent limbs are allowed to form closer to the ground than 4 feet, and many at that height will have to be sacrificed. Three to five main branches are generally sufficient. It is wise to cut these back to within a foot of the tree, leaving a terminal bud where the branch is removed, so that an elbow forms, pointing upward, giving great strength to the branch and spread to the tree. The laterals receive like treatment in a year or two. A tree thus started will have little use for a central stem which excludes the sunlight so necessary for the fruit. We find that too severe topping of the tree is apt to induce sun scald on the branch or body of the tree.

Having given the tree its foundation shape, the next care is to keep that shape. Each year attention is given to removal of water shoots or suckers, branches that cross each other or shut out the sunlight and interfere with spraying. Perhaps 20 feet is the limit to the height of an apple tree with these general form conditions in view. March is a good month in which to prune.

BEST SOIL FOR STRAWBERRY

Field Which Has Produced Good Crop of Corn Is Favored—Manure Is Beneficial.

Strawberries will thrive on a great variety of soils, but a very fertile soil brings the best results. For an average field which has produced a good crop of corn about ten loads of manure per acre, evenly spread this fall, with the manure spreader, would be beneficial to the growth of strawberries. Then the field can be plowed early next spring and disced and harrowed until the manure is thoroughly worked into the soil.

Manure should be placed on the strawberry ground as soon as possible after leaving the stables as this helps to keep down the development of the white grubs which eat off the roots of strawberry plants.

PROPER SELECTION OF FARM

Of Vast Importance in Choosing Site for Home to Consider Various Features Carefully.

The wise selection of a farm is vital to the success and satisfaction of farm life. Choosing a farm often means choosing a place in which to live and work for a lifetime. It is important, of course, to decide wisely in buying for investment, but in making a selection for a home it is of double importance that one consider the various features that may have a decisive bearing on the farm business or that may affect the home life.—United States department of agriculture.

TRUE ARMY WORM DESCRIBED

Genuine Article Is Nearly Naked, Smooth, Striped Caterpillar, 1½ Inches Long.

The genuine article is a nearly naked, smooth, striped caterpillar about 1½ inches long. His greenish body is marked with three dark stripes which run, one down each side and one down the back, for the length of the body. The head is greenish brown, speckled with black.
