The boll weevil commission is by law armed with authority extending even to ordering any parish or section in the State to cease the planting of cotton that the spread of the destructive insect may be checked. But can such power and authority be enforced unless it has the sanction of popular favor. For instance, it is said that the weevil is in Louisiana; that it has made its appearance in Sabine parish and the question arises, can the commission enforce its legal authority without provoking an opposition that would lead to serious consequences. Men do not stop to reason that it takes drastic measures to root out an enemy such as the weevil, but fly to pieces and talk of armed opposition if necessary.

The commission will do nothing that will hurt the farmer classes if it can do otherwise, but if it should become necessary to quarantine the insect or place one or more parishes under the ban of prohibition the commission will certainly do it, and they will be acting for the public good.—Acroyelles Blade.
