WHERE GERMAN CITIES EXCEL

Count von Bernstorff Tells of the Public Spirit Which Has Brought Them Advantages.

Count von Bernstorff, German ambassador to the United States, recently spoke before the Women's Civic League of Baltimore on "Government of German Cities."

The usual form of government in a German city, he said, was a council, which elected an ober burgomeister and two assistant burgomeisters, or city managers. The position of the first was practically a life position if he were satisfactory, although he was re-elected at long intervals.

Speaking of the old city of Frankfurt, County Bernstorff described how it had grown. Streets, he said, are not laid out by private enterprise, but by the action of the city council. The council also regulates buildings in the various sections of the town and forbids that there shall be more than a certain proportion of the land built upon, so that there may be sufficient open spaces.

Within the last ten years, he declared, Frankfurt had expended more than $50,000,000 in the purchase of land in the city and outside of it, so that at present the city owns 16,650 acres, 3,800 of which are outside of the city limits. Owning this land, the city regulates its growth as seems best, builds model homes for workmen, constructs parks and playgrounds, and builds schools, colleges, museums and the like.

"The workmen's insurance laws," said the speaker, "have had a great influence on the German cities in getting a strong impetus which led to the creation of many useful municipal institutions."

Lepzig, he said, was devoting some of the land held by the city for building suitable homes for the poor, and the insurance companies were making loans for building workmen's cottages.
