Road to Grandma's House.

Down through the meadow Where the sweetest violets grew. There lay the happiest path My childish fancy knew. It led across the little stream That babbled as it flowed, Then wound through bush and bramble Till it joined the traveled road.

The path was lined with buttercups And dandelions gold, Where loitering children gathered, All their childish hands could hold; And fashioned then a floral wreath, A wreath of love, they said, To carry up to grandma, To crown her snowy head.

The road that led to grandma's house! How fresh the memory seems; The flowers and birds and running brook!

Now fill an old man's dreams, He sees again the aged form, As welcoming, she stands, The patient, gentle face aglow, The kindly, outstretched hands.

The Summer Rain.

Ho for the rain, the summer rain! As it tinkles its silver bells, Over the meadows rich with grain, Over the shady dells; Over the hills where cattle graze, Over the dusty trees; Sing for the rain a song of praise, Freshening all of these.

Ho for the rain, the summer rain! Where little seeds thirsting lie, Never to waken to life again, Till its twinkling bells go by. The farmer hoeing the parching corn Studies the sky in vain; When lo! on his face erst so forlorn Splashes the welcome rain.

Ho for the rain, the summer rain! Alike in city and town; For without the fields of rip'ning grain Humanity wears a frown. The farmer grieves and the merchant sighs; For nothing prospers, it's plain, Unless earth is nourished by full supplies.

Of the welcome summer rain - HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

Toil And Repose.

This day I toil beneath the fervent heat Of summer sunshine over land so fair, And when my work is done, complete, I journey homeward, free from care.

Enjoying all of evening's cooling hours - Resting from the toiling of the day; I then lie down 'mid tidy bowers, And sleep the pleasant night away.
