It is because God is visible in history that its office is the noblest except the poet. The poet is at once the interpreter and the favorite of heaven. He catches the first beam of light that flows from its uncreated source. He repeats the message of the Infinite, without always being able to analyze it, and often without knowing how he received it, or why he was selected for its utterance. But history yields in dignity alone, for it not only watches all the great encounters of life, but recalls what has vanished, and partaking of a bliss like that of creating, restores it to animated being.

Look round upon this beautiful earth, this temperate zone of the solar system, and see how much man has done for its subjection and adornment; making the wilderness blossom with cities, and the seemingly inhospitable sea cheerfully social with the richly freighted fleets of a world-wide commerce. Look also at the condition of society, and consider by what amenities barbarism has been softened and refined; what guarantees of intelligence and liberty have superseded the lawfulness of brute force; and what copious interchanges of thought and love have taken the place of the sombre stolidity of the savage.
