CULTURAL METHODS FOR THE HOME ORCHARD

VARIETIES OF FRUIT, SEASON AND SOIL CONDITIONS GOVERN METHODS.

CULTIVATION USUALLY PAYS

It Stimulates and Invigorates the Trees Causing Them To Develop a Deep Root System.

Orchard culture and methods will depend on size or age of trees, nature of root growth, and the kind of season, whether rainy or dry, and the type of soil in which the trees are growing, says B. Szymoniak, associate horticulturist, Extension Division, Louisiana State University. Generally it is advisable to cultivate the young orchard in the same manner that a garden is cultivated. A good practice therefore would be to start the home orchard in the home garden. The young trees must be protected from injury while plowing. This is done by placing fence posts on either side of the trees and by keeping two feet away from the trees while cultivating the soil with horse implements.

On the upland type of soil it is best to give level cultivation. If the young orchard is not grown in the garden, or if no garden crops are grown in the orchard, it should be planted to cowpeas or soybeans during the month of June, planting them in rows which should be cultivated. Fig trees grow under orchard conditions should not be cultivated, but the soil around the roots should be heavily mulched with pine straw and leaves or other coarse material. This is done for the reason that fig trees have a very shallow root system and the trees will not do well if the roots are disturbed. The mulch should not be piled up around the trunks of the trees but should be applied at least two feet away from the base. In growing trees in alluvial soil where the water table is close to the surface it is necessary to plant the trees on wide ridges with water furrows between the rows to drain off the surplus water.

Under Louisiana conditions, except in the case of pear trees, which should not be cultivated, it is seldom advisable to grow fruit trees in sod or to allow the grass to establish itself in the home orchard because the grass makes a very rank growth and probably excludes the air from the soil. It also causes the trees to develop roots close to the surface where they are unfavorably influenced by excessive heat, moisture and drought. Cultivation stimulates and invigorates the trees, causing them to develop a deep root system. The roots of the trees are the foundation of the trees and must be properly cared for by proper cultivation.

After the orchard has come into bearing it is best not to give it as intensive cultivation as is given the young orchard, but a definite system must be followed depending on local conditions. The system that has given good results in practice is to plant cowpeas or soybeans, broadcast or in rows, during the month of June or July to be plowed under in the fall and the soil planted to a winter cover crop of rye or barley. This can be pastured by sheep or calves during the winter provided the trees are not injured. Cattle should never be allowed in an orchard unless the trees are protected. The winter cover crop is plowed under in the spring and the orchard disced or harrowed two or three times, depending on the season. Then cowpeas or soybeans are again planted during June or July. This system can be followed not only in the home orchard where the trees are mature but it can be practiced also in pear orchards with good results.

Cultivation is one of the most important factors in growing trees. By cultivation the roots are given proper soil conditions for best development. Good fruit and healthy leaves as well as branches depend on the root system which feeds them. Therefore the root system is the foundation on which the life of the tree depends and must be properly cared for by cultivation in accordance with the demands of each kind of tree grown. Cultivation keeps the trees in a vigorous fruiting condition and enables the trees to resist insects and diseases.

DARING MOTOR CAR DRIVERS WILL RACE AT BIG STATE FAIR

Noted Death-Defying Track Kings To Thrill Crowds at Shreveport October 26.

If you wish to be thrilled by hair-raising motor contests, don't miss the automobile race meet at the Victory State Fair at Shreveport. The meet will be pulled off the fifth day of the Fair, Sunday, October 26. J. Alex Sloan, who is recognized as the best known race official in the country, will be general director of the races. With Sloan in charge, there is an absolute guarantee that every thrill known to spectators will be available.

Automobile racing was never more popular than right now, and the State Fair management had this fact in mind in placing a great race meet on its 1919 program. Attractive purses have been hung up, and several of the world's most noted drivers will be on the State Fair track. The smashing of records for the mile circuit will be among the dangerous stunts attempted by these dare-devils. Astonishing time has been recorded at the Louisiana Fair track at previous meets, and if those records are surpassed the 1919 contestants will be compelled to drive their cars around the circle in a way that will make the spectators breathless with excitement.

In addition to seeing world-famed drivers in action, the crowd at the State Fair October 26 will also have the opportunity of focusing their eyes upon some of the most celebrated racing machines ever built. Some of these cars were constructed exclusively for track events similar to those to be pulled off at Shreveport during the Victory Fair, which opens October 22 and runs six days.
